lap; La Grivotte, whom a hoarse cough was choking. For a moment Sister Hyacinthe's gay face shone out amidst the whiteness of her coif and wimple, dominating all the others. The painful journey was continuing, with a ray of divine hope still and ever shining yonder. Then everything slowly vanished from Pierre's eyes as a fresh wave of memory brought the past back from afar; and nothing of the present remained save the lulling hymn, the indistinct voices of dreamland, emerging from the invisible.

Henceforth he was at the seminary. The class-rooms, the recreation ground with its trees, rose up clearly before him. But "Il at once he only beheld, as in a mirror, the youthful face which and then been his, and he contemplated it and scrutinised it, is though it had been the face of a stranger. Tall and slender, he had an elongated visage, with an unusually developed forehead, lofty and straight like a tower; whilst his jaws tapered, ending in a small, refined chin. He seemed, in fact, to be all brains; his mouth, rather large, alone retained an expression of tenderness. Indeed, when his usually serious face relaxed, his mouth and eyes acquired an exceedingly soft expression, betokening an unsatisfied, hungry desire to love, devote oneself, and live. But, immediately afterwards, the look of intellectual passion would come back again, that intellectuality which had ever consumed him with an anxiety to understand and know. And it was with surprise that he now recalled those years of seminary life. How was it that he had so long been able to accept the rude dis-I cipline of blind faith, of obedient belief in everything without the slightest examination? It had been required of him that he should absolutely surrender his reasoning faculties, and he had striven to do so, had succeeded indeed in stifling his torturing need of truth. Doubtless he had been softened, weakened by his mother's tears, had been possessed by the sole desire to afford her the great happiness she dreamt of. Yet now he remembered certain quiverings of revolt; he found in the depths of his mind the memory of nights which he had spent in weeping without knowing why, nights peopled with vague images, nights through which galloped the free, virile life of the world, when Marie's face incessantly returned to him, such as he had seen it one morning, dazzling and bathed in tears, while she embraced him with her whole soul. And that alone now remained; his years of religious study with their monotonous lessons, their ever similar excreises and ceremonies, had flown away into the same haze, into a vague half-light, full of mortal silence.

Then, just as the train had passed through a station at full speed, with the sudden uproar of its rush, there arose within him a succession of confused visions. He had noticed a large deserted enclosure, and fancied that he could see himself within it at twenty years of age. His reverie was wandering. An indisposition piscinas and processions compel Zola to lash out at the Stafe in this novel, depicting 5 days of National pilgrimage in August, packed with drama, psychological insight and the eternal values, all thrown together with about a hundred characters.

The shocking state of affairs at the Grotto, the Churches;

This great literary and philosophical effort of Emile Zolas makes this book what it is. When first published it attracted so much attention of the Church that the Lourdes Church dignitaries banned its sale in Lourdes locale, sheerly by political pressure tactics.

Masses of men in motion is "LOURDES". Here you willfind the humours of night life blended with touching and moving drama of real life. Of all the books of Zola, this one has the distinction of widest circulation. withcred leaves rained upon them. However, he could not remember the words that they had spoken; her pale smile, her young face, still so charming though already dimmed by regretfulness for life, alone remained present with him. But he realised that she had evoked the far-off day of their parting, on that same spot, behind the hedge fleeked with sunlight; and all that was already as though dead-their tears, their embrace, their promise to find one another some day with a certainty of happiness. For although they had found one another again, what availed it, since she was but a corpse, and he was about to bid farewell to the life of the world? As the doctors condemned her, as she would never be woman, nor wife, nor mother, he, on his side, might well renounce manhood, and annihilate himself, dedicate himself to God, to Whom his mother gave him. And he still felt within him the soft bitterness of that last interview: Marie smiling painfully at memory of their childish play and prattle, and speaking to him of the happiness which he would assuredly find in the service of God; so penetrated indeed with emotion at this thought. that she had made him promise that he would let her hear him say his first mass.

But the train was passing the station of Sainte-Maure, and just then a sudden uproar momentarily brought Pierre's attention back to the carriage and its occupants. He fancied that there had been some fresh seizure or swooning, but the suffering faces that he beheld were still the same, ever contracted by the same expression of anxious waiting for the divine succour which was so slow in coming. M. Sabathier was vainly striving to get his legs into a comfortable position, whilst Brother Isidore raised a feeble continuous moan like a dying child, and Madame Vêtu, a prey to terrible agony, devoured by her disease, sat motionless, and kept her lips tightly closed, her face distorted, haggard, and almost black. The noise which Pierre had heard had been occasioned by Madame de Jonquière, who whilst cleansing a basin had dropped the large zine water-can. And, despite their tonnent, this had made the patients laugh, like the simple souls they were, rendered puerile by suffering. However, Sister Hyacinthe, who rightly called them her children, children whom she governed with a word, at once set them saving the chaplet again, pending the Angelus, which would only be said at Châtellerault, in accordance with the predetermined programme. And thereupon the "Aves" followed one after the other, spreading into a confused murmuring and mumbling amidst the rattling of the coupling-irons and noisy growling of the wheels.

Pierre had meantime relapsed into his reverie, and beheld himself as he had been at six-and-twenty, when ordained a priest. Tardy scruples had come to him a few days before his ordination, a semi-consciousness that he was binding himself without having clearly questioned his heart and mind. But he had avoided doing share in money. And as soon as Guillaume had found him out of danger he had gone off again, once more vanishing into the unknown. But then through what a long convalescence he, Pierre, had passed, buried as it were in that deserted house. He had done nothing to detain Guillaume, for he realised that there was an abyss between them. At first the solitude had brought him suffering, but afterwards it had grown very pleasant, whether in the deep silence of the rooms which the rare noises of the street did not disturb, or under the screening, shady foliage of the little garden, where he could spend whole days without seeing a saul. His favourite place of refuge, however, was the old laboratory, his father's cabinet, which his mother for twenty years had kept earefully locked up, as though to immure within it all the incredulity and damnation of the past. And despite the gentleness, the respectful submissiveness which she had shown in former times, she would perhaps have some day ended by destroying all her husband's books and papers, had not death so suddenly surprised her. Pierre, however, had once more had the windows opened, the writing table and the bookease dusted, and, installed in the large leather armehair, he now spent delicious hours there, regenerated as it were by his illness, brought back to his youthful days again, deriving a wondrous intellectual delight from the perusai of the books which he came upon.

The only person whom he remembered having received during those two months of slow recovery was Doctor Chassaigne, an old friend of his father's, a medical man of real merit, who, with the one ambition of curing disease, modestly confined himself to the rôle of the practitioner. It was in vain that the doctor had sought to save Madame Froment, but he flattered himself that he had extrieated the young priest from grievous danger; and he came to see him from time to time, to chat with him and cheer him talking with him of his father, the great ehemist, of whom he recounted many a charming aneedote, many a particular still glowing with the flame of ardent friendship. Little by little, amidst the weak languor of convalescence, the son had thus beheld an embodiment of charming simplicity, affection, and good nature rising up before him. It was his father such as he had really been, not the man of stern science whom he had pictured whilst listening to his mother. Certainly she had never taught him aught but respect for that dear memory; but had not her husband been the unbeliever, the man who denied, and made the angels weep, the artisan of impiety who sought to change the world that God had made? And so he had long remained a gloomy vision, a spectre of damnation prowling about the house, whereas now he became the house's very light, clear and gay, a worker consumed by a longing for truth, who had never desired anything but the love and happiness of all. For his part, Doetor Chassaigne, a Pyrenean by birth, born in a far-off seeluded village where

LOURDES

by EMILE ZOLA

WILCO PUBLISHING HOUS

33, Ropewalk Lane, Rampart Row, Bombay 1.

ron and Madame Chaise, who dragged their weary legs; whilst little Gustave, quite worn out, kept on tapping the sanded path with his crutch, his right hand covered, meantime, with all the wax that had dripped upon it. Every sufferer who could walk was there, among others Elise Rouquet, who, with her bare red face, passed by like some apparition from among the damned, Others were laughing; Sophic Couteau, the little girl who had been miraculously healed the previous year, was quite forgetting herself, playing with her taper as though it were a switch. Heads followed heads without a pause, heads of women especially, more often with sordid, common features, but at times wearing an exalted expression, which you saw for a second ere it vanished amidst the fantastic illumination. And there was no end to that terrible march past; fresh pilgrims were ever appearing. Among them, Pierre and Marie noticed yet another little black shadowy figure, gliding along in a discreet, humble way; it was Madame Maze, whom they would not have recognised if she had not for a moment raised her pale face, down which the tears were streaming.

"Look," explained Pierre; "the first tapers in the procession are reaching the Place du Rosaire, and I am sure that half of the pilgrims are still in front of the Grotto."

Matie had raised her eyes. Up yonder, on the left-hand side of the Basihca, she could see other lights incessantly appearing with that mechanical kind of movement which seemed as though it would never cease. "Ah!" she said, "how many, how many distressed souls there are! For each of those little flames is a suffering soul seeking deliverance, is it not?"

Pierre had to lean over in order to hear her, for since the procession had been streaming by, so near to them, they had been deafened by the sound of the endless canticle, the hymn of Bernadette. The voices of the pilgrims rang out more loudly than ever amidst the increasing vertigo; the couplets became jumbled together—each batch of processionists chanted a different one with the ecstatic voices of beings possessed, who can no longer hear themselves. There was a huge indistinct clamour, the distracted clamour of a multitude intoxicated by its ardent faith. And meantime the refrain of "Ave, ave, ave Marial" was ever returning, rising, with its frantic, importunate rhythm, above everything else.

All at once Pierre and Marie, to their great surprise, saw M. de Guersaint before them again. "Ah! my children," he said, "I did not want to linger too long up there; I cut through the procession twice in order to get back to you. But what a sight, what a sight it is! It is certainly the first beautiful thing that I have seen since I have been here!" Thereupon he began to describe the procession as he had beheld it from the Calvary height. "Imagine," said hc, "another heaven, a heaven down

LOURDES

. Complete and Unabridged

All Rights Reserved by WILCO PUBLISHING HOUSE

First Printed in Wilco Edition: March 1959.

Printed by D. N. Mahale at the Kanada Press, Podar Chambers.

Parsi Bazar Street, Bombay I, and published by Jaisukh H. Shah for Wilco Publishing House, 33 Ropewalk Lane, Bombay 1.

WILCO PUBLISHING HOUSE

33, Ropewalk Lane, Rampart Row, Bombay 1.

accumulated interest had so increased the amount of indebtedness that it had risen to six hundred thousand franes; and as, on the other hand, it was estimated that four hundred thousand franes would be required to finish the church, a million was needed to save this young ruin from certain destruction. The Fathers of the Grotto were thenceforth able to sleep in peace; they had assassinated the poor church; it was as dead as Abbé

Peyramale himself.

The bells of the Basilica rang out triumphantly, and Father Sempé reigned as a victor at the conclusion of that great struggle, that dagger warfare in which not only a man, but stones also, had been done to death in the shrouding gloom of intriguing sacristies. And old Lourdes, obstinate and unintelligent, paid a hard penalty for its minister, who had died struggling, killed by his love for his parish, for now the new town did not cease to grow and prosper at the expense of the old one. All the wealth flowed to the former: the Fathers of the Grotto coined money, financed hotels and candle shops, and sold the water of the source, although a clause of their agreement with the municipality expressly prohibited them from carrying on any commercial pursuits.

The whole region began to rot and fester; the triumph of the Grotto had brought about such a passion for lucre, such a burning, feverish desire to possess and enjoy, that extraordinary perversion set in, growing worse and worse each day, and changing Bernadette's peaceful Bethlehem into a perfect Sodom or Gomorrah. Father Sempé had ensured the triumph of his Divinity by spreading human abominations all around and wrecking thousands of souls. Gigantic buildings rose from the ground, five or six millions of francs had already been expended, everything being sacrificed to the stern determination to leave the poor parish out in the cold and keep the entire plunder for self and friends. Those costly, colossal gradient-ways had only been erected in order to avoid compliance with the Virgin's express desire that the faithful should come to the Grotto in procession. For to go down from the Basilica by the incline on the left, and climb up to it again by the incline on the right, could certainly not be called going to the Grotto in procession: it was simply so much revolving in a circle. However, the Fathers cared little about that; they had succeeded in compelling people to start from their premises and return to them, in order that they might be the sole proprietors of the affair, the opulent farmers who garnered the whole harvest. Abbé Peyramale lay buried in the crypt of his unfinished, ruined church, and Bernadette, who had long since dragged out her life of suffering in the depths of a convent far away, was now likewise sleeping the eternal sleep under a flagstone in a chapel.

Deep silence fell when Doctor Chassaigne had finished this long parrative. Then, with a painful effort, he rose to his feet again:

LOURDES

THE FIRST DAY

Ι

PILGRIMS AND PATIENTS

THE pilgrims and patients, closely packed on the hard seats of the third-class carriage, were just finishing the "Ave maris Stella," which they had begun to chant on leaving the terminus of the Orleans line, when Marie, slightly raised on her couch of misery and restless with feverish impatience, caught sight of the Paris fortifications through the window of the moving train.

"Ah, the fortifications!" she exclaimed in a tone which was joyous despite her suffering. "Here we are, out of Paris; we are off at last!"

Her delight drew a smile from her father, M. de Guersaint, who sat in front of her, whilst Abbé Pierre Froment, who was looking at her with fraternal affection, was so carried away by his compassionate anxiety as to say aloud: "And now we are in for it till to-morrow morning. We shall only reach Lourdes at three-fforty. We have more than two-and-twenty hours' journey before his."

It was half-past five, the sun had risen, radiant in the pure sky of a delightful morning. It was a Friday, the 19th of August, On the horizon, however, some small heavy clouds already presaged a terrible day of stormy heat. And the oblique sun-rays were enfilading the compartments of the railway carriage, filling hem with dancing, golden dust.

"Yes, two-and-twenty hours," murmured Marie, relapsing into

"Yes, two-and-twenty hours," murmured Marie, relapsing into hguish. "Mon Dieul what a long time we must still wait!"

Then her father helped her to lie down again in the narrow ox, a kind of wooden gutter, in which she had been living for even years past. Making an exception in her favour, the railway ficials had consented to take as luggage the two pairs of wheels hich could be removed from the box, or fitted to it whenever it exame necessary to transport her from place to place. Packed tween the sides of this movable coffin, she occupied the room three passengers on the carriage seat; and for a moment she there with ever closed. Although the was three-and twenty there with eyes closed. Although she was three-and-twenty, a shen, cmaciated face was still delicately infantile, charming spite everything in the midst of her marvellous fair heir, the hair of a queen, which illness had respected. Clad with the utmost simplicity in a gown of thin woollen stuff, she wore, hanging from her neek, the card bearing her name and number, which entitled her to hospitalisation, or free treatment. She herself had insisted on making the journey in this humble fashion, not wishing to be a source of expense to her relatives, who little by little had falleninto very straitened eircumstances. And thus it was that she found herself in a third-class carriage of the "white train," the train which carried the greatest sufferers, the most woeful of the fourteen trains going to Lourdes that day, the one in which, in addition to five hundred healthy pilgrims, nearly three hundred unfortunate wretches, weak to the point of exhaustion, racked by suffering, were heaped together, and borne at express speed from one to the other end of France.

Sorry that he had saddened her, Pierre continued to gaze at her with the air of a compassionate elder brother. He had just completed his thirtieth year, and was pale and slight, with a broad forchead. After busying himself with all the arrangements for the journey, he had been desirous of accompanying her, and, having obtained admission among the Hospitallers of Our Lady of Salvation as an auxiliary member, wore on his cassock the red. orange-tipped cross of a hearer. M. de Guersaint on his side had simply pinned the little scarlet cross of the pilgrimage on his grey cloth jacket. The idea of travelling appeared to delight him; although he was over fifty he still looked young, and, with his eyes ever wandering over the landscape, he seemed unable to keep his head still—a bird-like head it was, with an expression of good-nature and absent-mindedness.

However, in spite of the violent shaking of the train, which constantly drew sighs from Marie, Sister Hyacinthe had risen to her feet in the adjoining compartment. She noticed that the sun's rays were streaming in the girl's face.

"Pull down the blind, Monsieur l'Abbé," she said to Pierre. "Come, come, we must instal ourselves properly, and set our little household in order."

Clad in the black robe of a Sister of the Assumption, enlivened by a white coif, a white wimple, and a large white apron, Sister Hyacinthe smiled, the picture of courageous activity. Her youth bloomed upon her small, fresh lips, and in the depths of her beautiful blue eyes, whose expression was ever gentle. She was not pretty, perhaps, still she was charming, slender and tall, the bih of her apron covering a flat chest like that of a young man; one of good heart, displaying a snowy complexion, and overflowing with health, gaicty, and innocence.

"But this sun is already roasting us," said she; "pray pull down your blind as well, madame."

Scated in the corner, near the Sister, was Madame de Jonquière, who had kept her little bag on her lap. She slowly pulled down

she had a daughter, Raymonde, who was four-and-twenty, and whom for motives of propriety she had placed in the charge of two lady-hospitallers, Madame Désagneaux and Madame Volmar, in a first-class carriage. For her part, directress as she was of a ward of the Hospital of Our Lady of Dolours at Lourdes, she did not quit her patients; and outside, swinging against the door of her compartment, was the regulation placard bearing under her own name those of the two Sisters of the Assumption who accom-The widow of a ruined man, she lived with her panied her.

daughter on the scanty income of four or five thousand francs a year, at the rear of a courtyard in the Rue Vanneau. But her charity was inexhaustible, and she gave all her time to the work of the Hospitality of Our Lady of Salvation, an institution whose red cross she wore on her gown of carmelite poplin, and whose aims she furthered with the most active zeal. Of a somewhat proud disposition, fond of being flattered and loved, she took great delight in this annual journey, from which both her heart and her passion derived contentment.

"You are right, Sister," she said, "we will organise matters. I really don't know why I am encumbering myself with this bag."

And thercupon she placed it under the seat, near her. "Wait a moment," resumed Sister Hyacinthe; "you have the water-can between your legs-it is in your way."

"No, no, it isn't, I assure you. Let it be. It must always be

Then they both set their house in order as they expressed it, so that for a day and a night they might live with their patients as comfortably as possible. The worry was that they had not been able to take Marie into their compartment, as she wished to have Pierre and her father near her; however neighbourly intercourse was easy enough over the low partition. Moreover the whole carriage, with its five compartments of ten seats each, formed but one moving chamber, a common room as it were which the eyes took in at a glance from end to end. Between its wooden walls, bare and yellow, under its white-painted panelled roof, it showed like a hospital ward, with all the disorder and promiscuous jumbling together of an improvised ambulance. Basins, brooms, and sponges lay about, half-hidden by the seats. Then, as the train only carried such luggage as the pilgrims could take with them, there were valises, deal boxes, bonnet boxes and bags, a wretched pile of poor worn-out things mended with bits of string, heaped up a little bit everywhere; and overhead the litter began again, what with articles of clothing, parcels and baskets hanging from brass pegs and swinging to and fro without a pause.

Amidst all this frippery the more afflicted patients, stretched on their narrow mattresses, which took up the room of several passengers, were shaken, carried along by the rumbling gyrations of the wheels; whilst those who were able to remain seated, leaned against the partitions, their faces pale, their heads resting upon pillows. According to the regulations there should have been one lady-hospitaller to each compartment. However, at the other end of the carriage there was but a second Sister of the Assumption, Sitter Claire des Anges. Some of the pilgrims who were in good health were already getting up, eating and drinking. One compartment was entirely occupied by women, ten pilgrims closely pressed together, young ones and old ones, all sadly, pitifully ugly. And as nobody dared to open the windows on account of the concemptives in the carriage, the heat soon began to make itself felt, and an unbearable odour crose, set free as it were by the jolting of the train as it went its way at express speed.

They had said their chaplets at Juvisy; and six o'clock was striking, and they were rushing like a hurricane past the station of Britishy, when Sixter Hyacinthe rose up. It was she who directed the pions creaties, which most of the pilgrims followed from small, blue-covered books.

"The Angelus, my children," said she with her pleasant smile, her maternal air which her great youth rendered so charming and

50 17.662.

Then the "Aves" again followed one another, and were drawing to an end when Pierre and Marie began to feel interested in two women, who occupied the other corner seats of their compartment. One of them, she who sat at Marie's feet, was a blonde of cleader build and bourgeoise appearance, some thirty and odd years of age, and faded before she had grown old. She shrank back, rearrely occupying any room, wearing a dark dress, and thorning colourless hair, and a long grief-stricken face which expreceed unlimited self-abandonment, infinite sadness. The woman in front of her, she who sat on the same seat as Pierre, was of the same age, but belonged to the working classes. She wore a black cap and displayed a face ravaged by wretchedness and eanticty, whilst on her lap she held a little girl of seven, who was 50 pale, 50 warted by illness, that she seemed scarcely four. With her note emirected, her eyelid: lowered and showing blue in her waren face, the child was unable to speak, unable to give utterance to more than a low plaint, a gentle moan, which rent the heart of her mother, leaning over her, each time that she heard it. World the cat a few grapes?" timidly asked the lady who had hitherto preserved silence. "I have some in my bashet."

Thonk you, madome," replied the woman, "the only takes milk, and cometimes not even that willingly. I took care to bring a lattleful with me."

Then, giving way to the decire which possesses the wretched to coulde their woes to others, the began to relate her story. Her same war Vincent, and her hurband, a gilder by trade, had been extried off by convernation. Left alone with her little Rose, who was the passion of her heart, she had worked by day and night at her calling as a dressmaker in order to bring the child up. But disease had come, and for fourteen months now she had had her in her arms like that, growing more and more woeful and wasted until reduced almost to nothingness. She, the mother, who never went to mass, had one day entered a church, impelled by despair to pray for her daughter's cure; and there she had heard a voice which had told her to take the little one to Lourdes, where the Blessed Virgin would have pity on her. Acquainted with nobody, not knowing even how the pilgrimages were organised, she had had but one idea—to work, save up the money necessary for the journey, take a ticket, and start off with the thirty sous remaining to her, destitute of all supplies save a bottle of milk for the child, not having even thought of purchasing a crust of bread for herself.

"What is the poor little thing suffering from?" resumed the lady.

"Oh, it must be consumption of the bowels, madame! But the doctors have names they give it. At first she only had slight pains in the stomach. Then her stomach began to swell and she suffered, oh, so dreadfully! it made one cry to see her. Her stomach has gone down now, only she's worn out; she has got so thin that she has no legs left her, and she's wasting away with continual sweating."

Then, as Rose, raising her eyclids, began to moan, her mother leant over her, distracted and turning pale. "What is the matter, my jewel, my treasure?" she asked. "Do you want to drink?"

But the little girl was already closing her dim eyes of a hazy sky-blue hue, and did not even answer, but relapsed into her torpor, quite white in the white frock she wore—a last coquetry on the part of her mother, who had gone to this useless expense in the hope that the Virgin would be more compassionate and gentle to a little sufferer who was well dressed, so immaculately white.

There was an interval of silence, and then Madame Vincent

There was an interval of silence, and then Madame Vincent inquired: "And you, madame, it's for yourself no doubt that you are going to Lourdes? One can see very well that you are ill."

But the lady, with a frightened look, shrank woefully into her corner, murmuring: "No, no, I am not ill. Would to God that I were! I should suffer less."

Her name was Madame Maze, and her heart was full of an incurable grief. After a love marriage to a big, gay fellow with ripe, red lips, she had found herself deserted at the end of a twelvemonth's honeymoon. Ever travelling, following the profession of a jeweller's bagman, her husband, who earned a deal of money, would disappear for six months at a stretch, deceive her from one frontier to the other of France, at times even carrying creatures about with him. And she worshipped him; she suffered so frightfully from it all that she had sought a remedy in religion, and had at last made up her mind to repair to Lourdes, in order to pray the Virgin to restore her husband to her and make him amend his ways.

Although Madame Vincent did not understand the other's words, she realised that she was a prey to great mental affliction, and they continued looking at one another, the mother, whom the sight of her dying daughter was killing, and the abandoned wife, whom her passion cast into throes of death-like agony.

However, Pierre, who, like Marie, had been listening to the conversation, now intervened. He was astonished that the dressmaker had not sought free treatment for her little patient. The Association of Our Lady of Salvation had been founded by the Augustine Fathers of the Assumption after the Franco-German War, with the object of contributing to the salvation of France and the defence of the Church by prayer in common and the practice of charity; and it was this association which had promoted the great pilgrimage movement, in particular initiating and unremittingly extending the national pilgrimage which every year, towards the close of August, set out for Lourdes. An elaborate organisation had been gradually perfected, donations of considerable amounts were collected in all parts of the world, sufferers were enrolled in every parish, and agreements were signed with the railway companies, to say nothing of the active help of the Little Sisters of the Assumption and the establishment of the Hospitality of Our Lady of Salvation, a widespread brotherhood of the benevolent, in which one beheld men and women, mostly belonging to society, who, under the orders of the pilgrimage managers, nursed the sick, helped to transport them, and watched over the observance of good discipline. A written request was needed for the sufferers to obtain hospitalisation, which dispensed them from making the smallest payment in respect either of their journey or their sojourn; they were fetched from their homes and conveyed back thither; and they simply had to provide a few provisions for the road. By far the greater number were recommended by priests or henevolent persons, who superintended the inquiries concerning them and obtained the needful papers, such as doctors certificates and certificates of births. And, these matters being settled, the sick ones had nothing further to trouble about, they became but so much suffering flesh, food for miracles, in the hands of the hospitallers of either sex.

"But you need only have applied to your parish priest, madame," Pierre explained. "This poor child is deserving of every sympathy.

She would have been immediately admitted. "I did not know it, Monsieur l'Abbé."

"Then how did you manage?"

"Why, Monsieur l'Abbé, I went to take a ticket at a place which one of my neighbours, who reads the newspapers, told me about." She was referring to the tickets, at greatly reduced rates, which were issued to the pilgrims possessed of means. And Marie listening to her, felt great pity for her, and also some shame; for she who was not entirely destitute of resources had succeeded in obtaining hospitalisation, thanks to Pierre, whereas that mother and her sorry child, after exhausting their scanty savings, remained without a copper.

However, a more violent jolt of the carriage drew a cry of pain from the girl. "Oh, father," she said, "pray raise me a little! I can't stay on my back any longer."

When M. de Guersaint had helped her into a sitting posture, she gave a deep sigh of relief. They were now at Etampes, after a run of an hour and a half from Paris, and what with the increased warmth of the sun, the dust, and the noise, weariness was becoming apparent already. Madame de Jonquière had got up to speak a few words of kindly encouragement to Marie over the partition; and Sister Hyacinthe moreover again rose, and gaily clapped her hands that she might be heard and obeyed from one to the other end of the carriage.

"Come, come!" said she, "we mustn't think of our little troubles. Let us pray and sing, and the Blessed Virgin will be with us."

She herself then began the Rosary according to the rite of Our Lady of Lourdes, and all the patients and pilgrims followed her. This was the first chaplet—the five joyful mysteries, the Annunciation, the Visitation, the Nativity, the Purification, and Jesus found in the Temple. Then they all began to chant the canticle: "Let us contemplate the heavenly Archangel!" Their voices were lost amid the loud rumbling of the wheels; you heard but the muffled surging of that human wave, stifling within the closed carriage which rolled on and on without a pause.

Although M. de Guersaint was a worshipper, he could never follow a hymn to the end. He got up, sat down again, and finished by resting his elbow on the partition and conversing in an undertone with a patient who sat against this same partition in the next compartment. The patient in question was a thick-set man of fifty, with a good-natured face and a large head, completely bald. His name was Sabathier, and for fifteen years he had been stricken with ataxia. He only suffered pain by fits and starts, but he had quite lost the use of his legs, which his wife, who accompanied him, moved for him as though they had been dead legs, whenever they became too heavy, weighty like bars of lead

"Yes, monsieur," he said, "such as you see me, I was formerly fifth-class professor at the Lycée Charlemagne. At first I thought that it was mere sciatica, but afterwards I was seized with sharp, lightning-like pains, red-hot sword thrusts, you know, in the muscles. During nearly ten years the disease kept on mastering me more and more. I consulted all the doctors, tried every imaginable mineral spring, and now I suffer less, but I can no longer move from my scat. And then, after long living without a thought of religion, I was led back to God by the idea that I was too wretched, and that Our Lady of Lourdes could not do otherwise than take pity on me."

Feeling interested, Pierre in his turn had leant over the partition and was listening.

"Is it not so, Monsieur l'Abbé?" continued M. Sabathier. "Is not suffering the best awakener of souls? This is the seventh year that I am going to Lourdes without despairing of cure. This year the Blessed Virgin will cure me, I feel sure of it. expect to be able to walk about again; I now live solely in that

M. Sabathier paused, he wished his wife to push his legs a little more to the left; and Pierre looked at him, astonished to find such obstinate faith in a man of intellect, in one of those university professors who, as a rule, are such Voltairians. How could the belief in miracles have germinated and taken root in this man's brain? As he himself said, great suffering alone explained this need of illusion, this blossoming of eternal and consolatory hope.

'And my wife and I," resumed the ex-professor, "are dressed, you see, as poor folks, for I wished to go as a mere pauper this year, and applied for hospitalisation in a spirit of humility in order that the Blessed Virgin might include me among the wretched, her children-only, as I did not wish to take the place of a real pauper, I gave fifty francs to the Hospitalité, and this, as you are aware, gives one the right to have a patient of one's own in the pilgrimage. I even know my patient. He was introduced to me at the railway station. He is suffering from tuberculosis, it appears, and seemed to me very low, very low."

A fresh interval of silence ensued. "Well", said M. Sabathier at last, "may the Blessed Virgin save him also, she who can do everything. I shall be so happy, she will have loaded me with favours."

Then the three men, isolating themselves from the others, went on conversing together, at first on medical subjects, and at last diverging into a discussion on romanesque architecture, à propos of a steeple which they had perceived on a hillside, and which every pilgrim had saluted with a sign of the cross. Swayed once more by the habits of cultivated intellect, the young priest and his two companions forgot themselves together in the midst of their fellow-passengers, all those poor, suffering, simple-minded folk, whom wretchedness stupefied. Another hour went by, two more canticles had just been sung, and the stations of Toury and Les Aubrais had been left behind, when, at Beaugeney, they at last ceased their chat, on hearing Sister Hyacinthe elap her hands and intonate in her fresh, sonorous voice: "Parce, Domine, parce populo tuo."

And then the chant went on; all voices became mingled in that ever-surging wave of prayer which stilled pain, excited hope, and little by little penetrated the entire being, harassed by the haunting thought of the grace and cure which one and all were going to seek so far away.

However, as Pierre sat down again, he saw that Marie was very pale, and had her eyes closed. By the painful contraction of her features he could tell that she was not sleeping. "Are you in greater suffering?" he asked,

"Yes, yes, I suffer dreadfully. I shall never last till the end.

It is this incessant jolting."

She moaned, raised her eyelids, and, half fainting, remained in a sitting posture, her eyes turned on the other sufferers. In the adjoining compartment, La Grivotte, hitherto stretched out, scarce breathing, like a corpse, had just raised herself up in front of M. Sabathier. She was a tall, slipshod, singular-looking creature of over thirty, with a round, ravaged face, which her frizzy hair and flaming eyes rendered almost pretty. She had reached the third stage of phthisis.

"Eh, mademoiselle," she said, addressing herself in a hoarse, indistinct voice to Marie; "how nice it would be if we could only doze off a little. But it can't be managed; all these wheels keep on whirling round and round in one's head."

Then, although it fatigued her to speak, she obstinately went on talking, volunteering particulars about herself. She was a mattress-maker, and with one of her aunts had long gone from yard to yard at Bercy to comb and sew up mattresses. And, indeed, it was to the pestilential wool which she had combed in her youth that she ascribed her malady. For five years past she had been making the round of the hospitals of Paris, and she spoke familiarly of all the great doctors. It was the Sisters of Charity. at the Lariboisière hospital, who, finding that she had a passion for . religious ceremonies, had completed her conversion, and convinced her that the Virgin awaited her at Lourdes to cure her.
"I certainly need it," said she. "The doctors say that I have one lung done for, and that the other one is scarcely any better. There are great big holes, you know. At first I only felt back between the shoulders and spat up some froth. But then I got . thin, and became a dreadful sight. And now I'm always in a sweat, and cough till I think I'm going to bring my heart And I can no longer spit. And I haven't the strength to start to raise even a finger. But he was not suffering from phthisis. He was dying of inflammation of the liver, contracted in Senegal. Very long and lank, he had a yellow face, with skin as dry and lifeless as parchment. The abscess which had formed in his liver had ended by breaking out externally, and amidst the continuous shivering of fever, vomiting, and delirium, suppuration was exhausting him. His eyes alone were still alive, eyes full of unextinguishable love, whose flame lighted up his expiring face, a peasant face such as painters have given to the crucified Christ, common, but rendered sublime at moments by its expression of faith and passion. He was a Breton, the last puny child of an over-numerous family, and had left his little share of land to his elder brothers. One of his sisters, Marthe, older than himself by a couple of years, accompanied him. She had been in service in Paris, an insignificant maid-of-all-work, but withal so devoted to her brother that she had left her situation to follow him, subsisting scantily on her petty savings.

you see. I can't eat.'

"I was lying on the platform," resumed La Grivotte, "when he was put in the carriage. There were four men carrying him-"

But she was unable to speak any further, for just then an attack of coughing shook and threw her back upon the seat. was suffocating, and the red flush on her checkbones turned blue, Sister Hyacinthe, however, immediately raised her head wiped her lips with a linen cloth, which became spotted with At the same time Madame de Jonquière gave attention to a patient in front of her, who had just fainted. was called Madame Vetu, and was the wife of a petty clockmaker of the Mouffetard district, who had not been able to shut up his shop in order to accompany her to Lourdes. And to make sure that she would be cared for she had sought and obtained hospitalisation. The fear of death was bringing her back to religion, although she had not set foot in church since her first communion. She knew that she was lost, that a cancer in the chest was cating into her; and she already had the haggard, orange-hued mark of the cancerous patient. Since the beginning of the journey she had not spoken a word, but, suffering terribly, had remained with her lips tightly closed. Then all at once, she had swooned away after an attack of vomiting.

"It is unbearable!" murmured Madame de la Jonquière, who herself felt faint; "we must let in a little fresh air.

Sister Hyaeinthe was just then laying La Grivotte to rest on her pillows. "Certainly," said she, "we will open the window for a few moments. But not on this side, for I am afraid we might have a fresh fit of coughing. Open the window on your side,

The heat was still increasing, and the occupants of the carriage were stilling in that heavy, cvil-smelling atmosphere. The pure air which came in when the window was opened brought relief, however. For a moment there were other duties to be attended to, a clearance and cleansing. The Sister emptied the basins out of the window, whilst the lady-hospitaller wiped the shaking floor with a sponge. Next, things had to be set in order; and then came a fresh anxiety, for the fourth patient, a slender girl whose face was entirely covered by a black fichu, and who had not yet moved, was saying that she felt hungry.

With quiet devotion Madame de Jonquière immediately tendered her services. "Don't you trouble, Sister," she said, "I will cut her bread into little bits for her."

Marie, with the need she felt of diverting her mind from her own sufferings, had already begun to take an interest in the motionless sufferer whose countenance was hidden by that black veil, for she not unnaturally suspected that it was a case of some distressing facial sore. She had merely been told that the patient was a servant, which was true, but the poor creature, a native of Picardy, named Elise Rouquet, had been obliged to leave her situation, and seek a home with a sister who ill-treated her, for no hospital would take her in. Extremely devout, she had for many months been possessed by an ardent desire to go to Lourdes.

Whilst Marie, with dread in her heart, waited for the fichu to be moved aside, Madame de Jonquière, having cut some bread into small pieces, inquired maternally "Are they small enough?

Can you put them into your mouth?"

Thereupon a hoarse voice growled confused words under the black fichu: "Yes, yes, madame." And at last the veil fell and Marie shuddered with horror.

It was a case of lupus which had preyed upon the unhappy woman's nose and mouth. Ulceration had spread, and was hourly spreading—in short, all the hideous peculiarities of this terrible disease were in full process of development, almost obliterating the traces of what once were pleasing womanly lineaments.

"Oh, look, Pierre!" Marie murmured, trembling.

The pricst in his turn shuddered as he beheld Elise Rouquet cautiously slipping the tiny pieces of bread into her poor shapeless mouth. Every one in the earriage had turned pale at sight of the awful apparition. And the same thought ascended from all those hope-inflated souls. Ah! Blessed Virgin, Powerful Virgin, what a miracle indeed if such an ill were cured!

"We must not think of ourselves, my children, if we wish to get well," resumed Sister Hyacinthe, who still retained her encouraging smile.

And then she made them say the second chaplet, the five sorrowful mysteries: Jesus in the Garden of Olives, Jesus scourged, Jesus erowned with thorns, Jesus carrying the cross, and Jesus erueified. Afterwards came the eantiele: "In thy help, Virgin, do I put my trust."

what just I through Bloise for three long he is a

had been rolling onward; and Marie, who had averted her eyes from Elise Rouquet, now turned them upon a man who occupied a corner seat in the compartment on her left, that in which Brother-Isidore was lying. She had noticed this man several times already. Poorly elad in an old black frock-coat, he looked still young, although his sparse beard was already turning grey; and, short and emaciated, he seemed to experience great suffering, his fleshless, livid face being covered with sweat. However, he remained motionless, ensconced in his corner, speaking to nobody, but staring straight before him with dilated eyes. And all at once Marie noticed that his eyelids were falling, and that he was fainting away.

She thereupon drew Sister Hyacinthe's attention to him: "Look Sister! One would think that that gentleman is dangerously ill."

"Which one, my dear child?"

"That one, over there, with his head thrown back."

General excitement followed, all the healthy pilgrims rose up to look, and it occurred to Madame de Jonquière to eall to Marthe, Brother Isidore's sister, and tell her to tap the man's hands.

"Question him, she added: "ask what ails him."

Marthe drew near, shook the man and questioned him.

But instead of an answer only a rattle came from his throat, and his eyes remained closed.

Then a frightened voice was heard saying, "I think he is going

The dread increased, words flew about, advice was tendered from one to the other end of the earriage. Nobody knew the man. He had certainly not obtained hospitalisation, for no white card was hanging from his neck. Somebody related, however, that he had seen him arrive, dragging himself along, but three minutes or so before the train started; and that he had remained quite motionless, scarce breathing, ever since he had flung himself with an air of intense weariness into that corner, where he was now apparently dying. His ticket was at last seen protruding from under the band of an old silk hat which hung from a peg near him.

"Ah, he is breathing again now!" Sister Hyacinthe suddenly exclaimed: "Ask him his name."

However, on being again questioned by Marthe, the man merely gave vent to a low plaint, an exclamation seareely articulated, "Oh, how I suffer!"

And thenceforth it was the only answer that could be obtained from him. With reference to everything that they wished to know, who he was, whence he came, what his illness was, what could be done for him, he gave no information, but still and ever continued moaning, "Oh, how I suffer—how I suffer!"

Sister Hyacinthe grew restless with impatience. Ah, if she had only been in the same compartment with him! And she resolved that she would change her seat at the first station they should stop at. Only there would be no stoppage for a long time. The position was becoming terrible, the more so as the man's head again fell back.

"He is dying, he is dying!" repeated the frightened voice.

What was to be donc, mon Dieu? The Sister was aware that one of the Fathers of the Assumption, Father Massias, was in the train with the Holy Oils, ready to administer extreme unction to the dying; for every year some of the patients passed away during the journey. But she did not dare to have recourse to the alarm signal. Moreover, in the cantine van where Sister Saint François officiated, there was a doctor with a little medicine chest. If the sufferer should survive until they reached Poitiers, where there would be half-an-hour's stoppage, all possible help might be given to him. But on the other hand he might suddenly expire. However, they ended by becoming somewhat calmer. The man, although still unconscious, began to breathe in a more regular manner, and seemed to fall asleep.

"To think of it, to die before getting there," murmured Marie with a shudder, "to die in sight of the promised land!" And as her father sought to reassure her she added: "I am suffering—I am suffering dreadfully myself."

"Have confidence," said Pierre, "the Blessed Virgin is watching over you."

She could no longer remain seated, and it became necessary to replace her in a recumbent position in her narrow coffin. Her father and the priest had to take every precaution in doing: so, for the slightest hurt drew a moan from her. And she lay there breathless, like one dead, her face contracted by suffering, and surrounded by her regal fair hair. They had now been rolling on, ever rolling on for nearly four hours. And if the carriage was so greatly shaken, with an unbearable spreading tendency, it was through being at the rear part of the train. The coupling irons shrieked, the wheels growled furiously; and as it was necessary to leave the windows partially open, the dust came in, acrid and burning; but it was especially the heat which grew terrible, a devouring stormy heat falling from a tawny sky which large hanging clouds had slowly covered. The hot carriages, those rolling boxes where the pilgrims ate and drank, where the sick lay in a vitiated atmosphere, amid dizzying moans, prayers, and hymns, became like so many furnaces.

And Marie was not the only one whose condition had been aggravated; others also were suffering from the journey. Resting in the lap of her despairing mother, who gazed at her with large, tcar-blurred eyes, little Rose had ceased to stir, and had grown so pale that Madame Maze had twice leant forward to feel her hands, fearful lest she should find them cold. At each moment also Madame Sabathier had weight was so great, said he, that it seemed as if his hips were being torn from him. Brother Isidore too had just begun to cry out, emerging from his accustomed torpor; and his sister had only been able to assuage his sufferings by raising him, and clasping him in her arms. La Grivotte seemed to be asleep, but a continuous hiccoughing shook her, and a tiny streamlet of blood dribbled from her mouth. Madame Vêtu had again vomited, Elise Rouquet no longer thought of hiding the frightful sore open on her face. And from the man yonder, breathing hard, there still came a lingubrious rattle, as though he were at every moment on the point of expiring. In vain did Madame de Jonquière and Sister Hyacinthe lavish their attentions on the patients, they could but slightly assuage so much suffering. At times it all seemed like an evil dream—that carriage of wretchedness and pain, hurried along at express speed, with a continuous shaking and jolting which made everything hanging from the pegs—the old clothes, the womout baskets mended with bits of string—swing to and fro incessantly. And in the compartment at the far end, the ten female pilgrims, some old, some young, and all pitifully ugly, sang on without a pause in cracked voices, shrill and dreary.

Then Pierre began to think of the other carriages of the train, that white train which conveyed most, if not all, of the more seriously afflicted patients; these carriages were rolling along, all displaying similar scenes of suffering among the three hundred sick and five hundred healthy pilgrims crowded within them. And afterwards, he thought of the other trains which were leaving Paris that day, the grey train and the blue train¹ which had preceded the white one, the green train, the yellow train, the pink train, the orange train which were following it. From hour to hour trains set out from one to the other end of France. And he thought, too, of those which that same morning had started from Orleans, Le Mans, Poitiers, Bordeaux, Marseilles, and Carcassonne. Coming from all parts, trains were rushing across that land of France at the same hour, all directing their course yonder towards the holy Grotto, bringing thirty thousand patients and pilgrims to the Virgin's feet. And he reflected that other days of the year witnessed a like rush of human beings, that not a week went by without Lourdes beholding the arrival of some pilgrimage; that it was not merely France which set out on the march, but all Europe, the whole world: that in certain years of great religious fervour there had been three hundred thousand, and even five hundred thousand, pilgrims and patients streaming to the spot.

Pierre fancied that he could hear those flying trains, those trains

Different-coloured tickets are issued for these trains; it is for this reason that they are called the white, blue, and grey trains, E.c.—Trans.

from everywhere, all converging towards the same rocky cavity where the tapers were blazing. They all rumbled loudly amid the cries of pain and snatches of hymns wafted from their carriages. They were the rolling hospitals of disease at its last stage, of human suffering rushing to the hope of cure, furiously seeking consolation between attacks of increased severity, with the ever-present threat of death—death hastened, supervening under awful conditions, amidst the mob-like seramble. They rolled on, they rolled on again and again, they rolled on without a pause, carrying the wretchedness of this world on its way to the divine illusion, the health of the infirm, the consolation of the afflicted.

And immense pity overflowed from Pierre's heart, human compassion for all the suffering and all the tears that consumed weak and naked man. He was sad unto death and ardent charity burnt within him, the unextinguishable flame as it were of his fraternal feelings towards all things and beings.

When they left the station of Saint Pierre des Corps at halfpast ten, Sister Hyacinthe gave the signal, and they recited the third chaplet, the five glorious mysteries, the Resurrection of Our Lord, the Ascension of Our Lord, the Mission of the Holy Ghost, the Assumption of the Most Blessed Virgin, the Crowning of the Most Blessed Virgin. And afterwards they sang the canticle of Bernadette, that long, long chant, composed of six times ten couplets, to which the Angelic Salutation, ever recurring, serves as a refrain—a prolonged lullaby slowly besetting one until it ends by penetrating one's entire being, transporting one into cestatic sleep, in delicious expectancy of a miracle.

11

PIERRE AND MARIE

The green landscapes of Poitou were now defiling before them, and Abbé Pierre Froment, gazing out of the window, watched the trees fly away till, little by little, he ceased to distinguish them. A steeple appeared and then vanished and all the pilgrims crossed themselves. They would not reach Poitiers until twelve-thirty-five, and the train was still rolling on amid the growing weariness of that oppressive, stormy day. Falling into a deep reverie, the young priest no longer heard the words of the eanticle, which sounded in his ears merely like a slow, wavy lullaby.

Forgetfulness of the present had come upon him an awai a ref the past filled his whole being. He was reascending the stream f memory, reaseending it to its source. He again beheld the ouse at Neuilly where he had been born and where he still lived, hat home of peace and toil, with its garden planted with a few inc trees, and parted by a quickest hedge and palisade from the garden of the neighbouring house, which was similar to his own. Ie was again three, perhaps four, years old, and round a table, haded by the big horse-chestnut tree, he onec more beheld his ather, his mother, and his clder brother at dejeuner. ather, Michel Froment, he could give no distinct lineaments; he pictured him but faintly, vaguely renowned as an illustrious chenist, bearing the title of Member of the Institute, and leading cloistered life in the laboratory which he had installed in that seeluded, deserted suburb. However he could plainly see first his brother Guillaume, then fourteen years of age, whom some holiday had brought from college that morning, and then and even more vividly his mother, so gentle and so quiet, with eyes so full of active kindliness. Later on he learnt what anguish had racked that religious soul, that believing woman who, from esteem and gratitude, had resignedly accepted marriage with an unbeliever, her senior by fifteen years, to whom her relatives were indebted for great services. He, Pierre, the tardy offspring of this union, born when his father was already near his fiftieth year, had only known his mother as a respectful, conquered woman in the presence of her husband, whom she had learnt to love passionately, with the frightful torment of knowing, however that he was doomed to perdition. And, all at onec, another memory flashed upon the young priest, the terrible memory of the day when his father had died, killed in his laboratory by an aecident, the explosion of a retort. He, Pierre, had then been five years old, and he remembered the slightest incidents—his mother's ery when she had found the shattered body among the remnants of the chemical appliances, then her terror, her sobs, her prayers at the idea that God had slain the unbeliever, damned him for evermore. Not daring to burn his books and papers, she had contented herself with locking up the laboratory, which henceforth nobody entered. And from that moment, haunted by a vision of hell, she had had but one idea, to possess herself of her second son who was still so young, to give him a strictly religious training, and through him to ransom her husband-secure his forgiveness from God. Guillaume, her elder boy, had already ceased to belong to her, having grown up at college, where he had been won over by the ideas of the century; but she resolved that the other, the younger one, should not leave the house, but should have a priest as tutor; and her secret dream, her consuming hope, was that she inight some day see him a priest himself, saying his first mass and solacing souls whom the thought of eternity tortured. Then; between green, leafy boughs, fleeked with sunlight, another figure rose vividly before Pierre's eyes. He suddenly beheld Marie de Guersaint as he had seen her one morning through a gap in the hedge dividing the two gardens. M. de Guersaint, who belonged to the petty Norman noblesse, was a combination of architect and inventor; and he was at that time busy with a scheme of model dwellings for the poor, to which churches and schools were to be attached; an affair of considerable magnitude, planned none too well, however, and in which, with his customary impetuosity, the lack of foresight of an imperfect artist, he was risking the three hundred thousand francs that he possessed. similarity of religious faith had drawn Madame de Guersaint and Madame Froment together; but the former was altogether a superior woman, perspicuous and rigid, with an iron hand which alone prevented her household from gliding to a catastrophe; and she was bringing up her two daughters, Blanche and Marie, in principles of narrow piety, the elder one already being as grave as herself, whilst the younger, albeit very devout, was still fond of play, with an intensity of life within her, which found vent in gay peals of sonorous laughter. From their early childhood Pierre and Marie played together, the hedge was ever being crossed, the two families constantly mingled. And on that clear sunshiny morning, when he pictured her parting the leafy branches, she was already ten years old. He, who was sixteen, was to enter the seminary on the following Tuesday. Never had she seemed to him so pretty. Her hair, of a pure golden hue, was so long that when it was let down it sufficed to clothe her. Well did he remember her face as, it had then been, with round cheeks, blue eyes, red mouth, and skin of dazzling, snowy whiteness. was indeed as gay and brilliant as the sun itself, a transplendency. Yet there were tears at the corners of her eyes, for she was aware of his coming departure. They sat down together at the far end of the garden, in the shadow cast by the hedge. Their hands mingled, and their hearts were very heavy. They had, however, never exchanged any vows amid their pastimes, for their innocence was absolute. But now, on the eve of separation, their mutual tenderness rose to their lips, and they spoke without knowing, swore that they would ever think of one another, and find one another again, some day, even as one meets in heaven to be very, very happy. Then, without understanding how it happened, they elasped each other tightly, to the point of suffocation, and kissed each other's face, weeping the while hot tears. And it was that delightful memory which Pierre had ever carried with him, which he felt alive within him still, after so many years, and after so many painful renunciations. Just then a more violent shock roused him from his reverie.

He turned his eyes upon the carriage and vaguely espied the suffering beings it contained—Madame Maze motionless, overwhelmed with grief; little Rose gently moaning in her mother's of rather long duration had, however, at one time interrupted his studies, and led to his being sent into the country. remained for a long time without seeing Marie; during his vacations spent at Neuilly he had twice failed to meet her, for she was almost always travelling. He knew that she was very ill, in conscquence of a fall from a horse when she was thirteen, a critical moment in a girl's life; and her despairing mother, perplexed by the contradictory advice of medical men, was taking her each year to a different watering-place. Then he learnt the startling news of the sudden tragical death of that mother, who was so severe and yet so useful to her kin. She had been carried off in five days by inflammation of the lungs, which she had contracted one evening whilst she was out walking at la Bourboule, through liaving taken off her mantle to place it round the shoulders of Marie, who had been conveyed thither for treatment. It land been necessary that the father should at once start off to fetch his daughter, who was mad with grief, and the corpse of his wife, who had been so suddenly torn from him. And unhappily, after losing her, the affairs of the family went from bad to worse in the hands of this architect, who, without counting, flung his fortune into the yawning gail of his unsuccessful enterprises. Marie no longer stirred from for couch; only Blanche remained to manage the household and she had matters of her own to attend to, being busy with the last examinations which she had to pass, the diplomas which she was obstinately intent on securing, foresceing as she did that she weekt some day have to earn her bread.

All at once, from amidst this mass of confused, half-forcesting incidents, Pierre was conscious of the rise of a vivid vision beattern health, he remembered, had again compelled him to take a bestday. He had just completed his twenty-fourth year, he was creatly behindhand, having so far only secured the four minor enders but on his return a sub-deaconship would be conferred on him, and an inviolable vow would bind him for evermore. And the Guersaints' little garden at Neuilly, whither he had formetly so often gone to play, again distinctly appeared before him, Maries couch had been rolled under the tall trees at the far end of the garden near the hedge, they were alone together in the say peacefulness of an autumnal afternoon, and he saw Manie chall in deep mourning for her mother and reclining there with less inert; whilst he, also clad in black, in a cassock aheady, set near her on an iron garden chair. For five years she had been suffer She was now eighteen, paler and thinner than tormer). but still adorable with her regal golden hair, which illness respected. He believed from what he had heard that she was d ed to remain infirm, condemned never to become a wa stricken even in her sex. The doctors, who failed to arm or ting her case, had abandoned her. Doubtless it we he . ! : dreary afternoon while the year so, living in the dizzy bewilderment of his decision, fancying that he had lopped off all human ties and feelings with a voluntary hatchet-stroke. His flesh had surely died with his childhood's innocent romance, that white-skinned girl with golden hair, whom now he never beheld otherwise than stretched upon her couch of suffering, her flesh as lifeless as his own. And he had afterwards made the sacrifice of his mind, which he then fancied even an easier one, hoping as he did that determination would suffice to prevent him from thinking. Besides, it was too late, he could not recoil at the last moment, and if when he pronounced the last solemn vow he felt a secret terror, an indeterminate but immense regret agitating him, he forgot everything, savouring a divine reward for his efforts, on the day when he afforded his mother the great and long-expected joy of hearing him say his first mass.

He could still see the poor woman in the little church of Neuilly, which she herself had selected, the church where the funeral service for his father had been eelebrated; he saw her on that cold November morning, kneeling almost alone in the dark little chapel, her hands hiding her face as she continued weeping whilst he raised the Host. It was there that she had tasted her last happiness, for she led a sad and lonely life, no longer seeing her clder son, who had gone away, swayed by other ideas than her own, bent on breaking off all family intercourse since his brother intended to enter the Church. It was said that Guilaume, a chemist of great talent, like his father, but at the same time a Bohemian, addicted to revolutionary dreams, was living in a little house in the suburbs, where he devoted himself to the dangerous study of explosive substances; and folks added that he was living with a woman who had come no one knew whenee. This it was which had severed the last tie between himself and his mother, all piety and propriety. For three years Pierre had not once seen. Guillaume, whom in his ehildhood he had worshipped as a kind, merry, and fatherly big brother.

merry, and fatherly big brother.

But there eame an awful pang to his heart—he once more beheld his mother lying dead. This again was a thunderbolt, an illness of searcely three days' duration, a sudden passing away, as in the ease of Madame de Guersaint. One evening, after a wild hunt for the doctor, he had found her motionless and quite white. She had died during his absence; and his lips had ever retained the icy thrill of the last kiss that he had given her. Of everything else—the vigil, the preparations, the funeral—he remembered nothing. All that had become lost in the black night of his stupor and grief, grief so extreme that he had almost died of it—seized with shivering on his return from the cemetery, struck down by a fever which during three weeks had kept him delirious, hovering between life and death. His brother had come and nursed him and liad then attended to pecuniary matters, dividing the little inheritance, leaving him the house and a structure of the structu folks still believed in sorceresses, inclined rather towards religion, although he had not set his feet inside a church during the forty years that he had been living in Paris. However, his conviction was absolute: if there were a heaven somewhere Michel Froment was assuredly there, and not merely there, but seated upon a throne on the Divinity's right hand. Then Pierre, in a few minutes, again lived through the frightful torment which, during two long months, had ravaged him. was not that he had found controversial works of an anti-religious character in the bookcase, or that his father, whose papers he sorted, had ever gone beyond his technical studies as a savant. But little by little, despite himself, the light of science dawned upon him, an ensemble of proven phenomena, which demolished dogmas and left within him nothing of the things which as a priest he should have believed. It seemed, in fact, as though illness had renewed him, as though he were again beginning to live and learn, amid the physical pleasantness of convalescence, that still subsisting weakness which lent penetrating lucidity to his brain. At the seminary, by the advice of his masters, he had always kept the spirit of inquiry, his thirst for knowledge, in check. Much of that which was taught him there had surprised him; however, he had succeeded in making the sacrifice of his mind required of his piety. But now, all the laboriously raised scaffolding of dogmas was swept away in a revolt of that sovereign mind which clamoured for its rights, and which he could no longer silence. Truth was bubbling up and overflowing in such an irresistible stream that he realised he would never succeed in lodging error in his brain again. It was indeed the total and irreparable ruin of faith. Although he had been able to kill his flesh by renouncing the romance of his youth, although he felt that he had altogether mastered carnal passion, he now knew that it would be impossible for him to make the sacrifice of his intelli-And he was not mistaken; it was indeed his father again springing to life in the depths of his being, and at last obtaining the mastery in that dual heredity in which, during so many years, his mother had dominated. The upper part of his face, his straight, towering brow, seemed to have risen yet higher, whilst the lower part, the small chin, the affectionate mouth, were becoming less distinct. However, he suffered; at certain twilight hours when his kindliness, his need of love awoke, he felt distracted with grief at no longer believing, distracted with desire to believe again; and it was necessary that the lighted lamp should be brought in, that he should see clearly around him and within him, before he could recover the energy and calmness of reason, the strength of martyrdom, the determination to sacri-

Then came the crisis. He was a priest and he no longer believed. This had suddenly vawned by the longer believed.

fice everything to the peace of his conscience.

abyss. It was the end of his life, the collapse of everything. What should he do? Did not simple rectitude require that he should throw off the eassock and return to the world? But he had seen some renegade priests and had despised them. A married priest with whom he was acquainted filled him with disgust. All this, no doubt, was but a survival of his long religious training. retained the notion that a priest cannot, must not, weaken; the idea that when one has dedicated oneself to God one cannot take possession of oneself again: Possibly, also, he felt that he was too plainly branded, too different from other men already, to prove otherwise than awkward and unwelcome among them. Since he had been cut off from them he would remain apart in his grievous pride. And, after days of anguish, days of struggle incessantly renewed, in which his thirst for happiness warred with the energies of his returning health, he took the heroic resolution that he would remain a priest, and an honest one. He would find the strength necessary for such abnegation. . Since he had conquered the flesh, albeit unable to conquer the brain, he felt sure of keeping his vow of chastity, and that would be unshakable; therein lay the pure, upright life which he was absolutely certain of living. What mattered the rest if he alone suffered, if nobody in the world suspected that his heart was reduced to ashes, that nothing remained of his faith, that he was agonising amidst fearful falschood? His rectitude would prove a firm prop; he would follow his priestly ealling like an honest man, without breaking any of the vows that he had taken; he would, in due accordance with the rites, discharge his duties as a minister of the Divinity, whom he would praise and glorify at the altar, and distribute as the Bread of Life to the faithful. Who, then, would dare to impute his loss of faith to him as a crime, even if this great misfortune should some day become known? And what more could be asked of him than lifelong devotion to his vow, regard for his ministry, and the practice of every charity without the hope of any future reward? In this wise he ended by ealming himself, still upright, still bearing his head creet, with the desolate grandeur of the priest who himself no longer believes, but continues watching over the faith of others. And he eertainly was not alone; he felt that he had many brothers, priests with ravaged minds, who had sunk into incredulity, and who yet, like soldiers without a fatherland, remained at the alter, and, despite everything, found the courage to make the divine illusion shine forth above the

On recovering his health Pierre had immediately resumed his service at the little church of Neuilly. He said his mass there every morning. But he had resolved to refuse any appointment, any preferment. Months and years went by, and he obstinately insisted on remaining the least known and the most humble of those priests who are tolerated in a parish, who appear and disappear after discharging their duty. The acceptance of any appointment would have seemed to him an aggravation of his falsehood, a theft from those who were more deserving than himself. And he had to resist frequent offers, for it was impossible for his merits to remain unnoticed. Indeed, his obstinate modesty provoked astonishment at the archbishop's palace, where there was a desire to utilise the power which could be divined in him. Now and again, it is true, he bitterly regretted that he was not useful, that he did not co-operate in some great work, in furthering the purification of the world, the salvation and happiness of all, in accordance with his own ardent, torturing desire. Fortunately his time was nearly all his own, and to console himself he gave rein to his passion for work by devouring every volume in his father's bookcase, and then again resuming and considering his studies, feverishly preoccupied with regard to the history of nations, full of a desire to explore the depths of the social and religious crisis, so that he might ascertain whether it were really

It was at this time, whilst rummaging one morning in one of the large drawers in the lower part of the bookcase, that he discovered quite a collection of papers respecting the apparitions of Lourdes. It was a very complete set of documents, comprising detailed notes of the interrogatories to which Bernadette had been subjected, copies of numerous official documents, and police and medical reports, in addition to many private and confidential letters of the greatest interest. This discovery had surprised Pierre, and he had questioned Doctor Chassaigne concerning it. The latter thereupon remembered that his friend, Michel Froment, had at one time passionately devoted himself to the study of Bernadette's case; and he himself, a native of a village near Lourdes, had procured for the chemist a portion of the documents in the collection. Pierre, in his turn, then became impassioned, and for a whole month continued studying the affair, powerfully beyond remedy.

in the collection. Pierre, in his turn, then became impassioned, and for a whole month continued studying the affair, powerfully attracted by the visionary's pure, upright nature, but indignant with all that had subsequently sprouted up—the barbarous fetishism, the painful superstitions, and the triumphant simony. In the access of unbelief which had come upon him, this story of Lourdes was certainly of a nature to complete the collapse of his faith. However, it had also excited his curiosity, and he would have liked to investigate it, to establish beyond dispute what scientific truth was in it, and render to pure Christianity the service of ridding it of his scoria, his fairy tale, all touching and childish as it was. But he had been obliged to relinquish his studies, shrinking from the necessity of making a journey to the

Grotto, and finding that it would be extremely difficult to obtain the information which he still needed; and of it all there at last of whom he could not think without a sensation of delightful charm and infinite pity.

The days went by, and Pierre led a more and more lonely life. Doetor Chassaigne had just left for the Pyrenees in a state of mortal anxiety. Abandoning his patients, he had set out for Canterets with his ailing wife, who was sinking more and more each day, to the infinite distress of both his charming daughter and himself. From that moment the little house at Neuilly fell into deathlike silence and emptiness. Pierre had no other distraction than that of occasionally going to see the Guersaints, who had long since left the neighbouring house, but whom he had found again in a small lodging in a wretched tenement of the district. And the memory of his first visit to them there was yet so fresh within him, that he felt a pang at his heart as he recalled his emotion at sight of the hapless Marie.

That pang roused him from his reverie, and on looking round he perceived Marie stretched on the seat, as he had found her on the day which he recalled, already imprisoned in that gutterlike box, that coffin to which wheels were adapted when she was taken out of doors for an airing. She, formerly so brimful of life, ever astir and laughing, was dying of inaction and immobility in that box. Of her old-time beauty she had retained nothing save her hair, which clad her as with a royal mantle, and she was so emaciated that she seemed to have grown smaller again, to have become once more a child. And what smaler again, to have become once more a child. And what was most distressing was the expression on her pale face, the blank, frigid stare of her eyes which did not see, the ever-haunting absent look, as of one whom her suffering overwhelmed. However, she noticed that Pierre was gazing at her, and at once desired to smile at him; but irresistible moans escaped her, and when she did at last smile, it was like a poor smitten creature who is convinced that she will expire before the miracle takes place. He was overcome by it, and, amidst all the sufferings with which the earriage abounded, hers were now the only ones that he beheld and heard, as though one and all were summed up in her, in the long and terrible agony of her beauty, gaiety, and youth.

Then by degrees, without taking his eyes off Marie, he again reverted to former days, again lived those hours, fraught with a mournful and bitter charm, which he had often spent beside her, when he called at the sorry lodging to keep her company. M. de Gursaint had finally ruined himself by trying to improve the artistic quality of the religious prints so widely sold in France, the faulty execution of which quite irritated him. His last resources had been swallowed up in deficient in foregight over printing firm; and, heedless as he was, deficient in foresight, ever trusting in Providence, his childish mind continually swayed by illusions, he did not notice the awful pecuniary embarrassment of the household; but applied himself to the study of aerialnavigation, without even realising what prodigious activity his elder daughter, Blanche, was forced to display, in order to earn the living of her two children, as she was wont to call her father and her sister. It was Blanche who, by running about Paris in the dust or the mud from morning to evening in order to give French or music lessons, contrived to provide the money necessary for the unremitting attentions which Marie required. And Marie often experienced attacks of despair-bursting into tears and accusing herself of being the primary cause of their ruín, as for years and years now it had been necessary to pay for medical attendance, and for taking her to almost every imaginable spring-La Bourboule, Aix, Lamalou, Amélie-les-Bains, and others. the outcome of ten years of varied diagnosis and treatment was that the doctors had now abandoned her. Some thought her illness to be due to the rupture of certain ligaments, others believed in the presence of a tumour, others again in paralysis due to injury to the spinal cord, and as she, with maidenly revolt, refused to undergo any examination, and they did not even dare to address precise questions to her, they each contented themselves with their several opinions and declared that she was beyond cure. Moreover, she now solely relied upon the Divinc help, having grown rigidly pious since she had been suffering, and finding her only relief in her ardent faith. Thus, every morning she herself read the holy offices; for to her great sorrow she was unable to go to church. Her inert limbs now seemed quite lifeless, and she had sunk into a condition of extreme weakness, to such a point, in fact, that on certain days it became necessary for her sister to place her food in her mouth.

Pierre was thinking of this when all at once he recalled an evening he had spent with her. The lamp had not yet been lighted, and as he sat beside her in the growing obscurity, she suddenly told him that she wished to go to Lourdes, feeling certain that she would return cured. He had experienced an uncomfortable sensation on hearing her speak in this fashion, and quite forgetting himself had exclaimed that it was folly to believe in such childishness. He had hitherto made it a rule never to converse with her on religious matters, having not only refused to be her confessor, but even to advise her with regard to the petty uncertainties of her pietism. In this respect he was influenced by feelings of both shame and compassion; to lie to her of all people would have made him suffer, and, moreover, he would have deemed himself a criminal had he even by a breath sullied the fervent pure faith which lent her such strength against pain. And so, regretting that he had not been able to restrain his exclamation, he remained sorely embarrassed, when all at once he felt the girl's cold hand take hold of his own. And then, emboldened by that she already knew his secret; his misfortune, that wretchedness, so fearful for a priest, of being unable to believe.

Despite himself he had revealed everything during their chats together, and she, with the delicate intuition of a friend, had been able to read his conscience. She felt terribly distressed on his account; she deemed him, with that mortal moral malady, to be more deserving of pity than herself. And then as he, thunderstruck, was still unable to find an answer, acknowledging the truth of her words by his very silence, she again began to speak to him of Lourdes, adding in a low whisper that she wished to confide him as well as herself to the protection of the Blessed Virgin, whom she entreated to restore him to faith. And from that evening forward she did not cease speaking on the subject, repeating again and again, that if she went to Lourdes she would be surely cured. But she was prevented from making the journey by lack of means and did not even dare to speak to her sister of the pecuniary question. So two months went by, and day by day she grew weaker, exhausted by her longing dreams, her eyes ever turned towards the flashing light of the miraculous Grotto far away.

Pierre then experienced many painful days. He had at first told Marie that he would not accompany her. But his decision was somewhat shaken by the thought that if he made up his mind to go, he might profit by the journey to continue his inquiries with regard to Bernadette, whose charming image lingered in his heart. And at last he even felt penetrated by a delightful feeling, an unacknowledged hope, the hope that Marie was perhaps right, that the Virgin might take pity on him and restore to him his former blind faith, the faith of the child who loves and does not question. Oh! to believe, to believe with his whole soul, to plunge into faith for ever! Doubtless there was no other possible happiness. He longed for faith with all the joyousness of his youth, with all the love that he had felt for his mother, with all his burning desire to escape from the torment of understanding and knowing, and to slumber for ever in the depths of divine ignorance. It was cowardly, and yet so delightful; to exist no more, to become a mere thing in the hands of the Divinity. And thus he was at last possessed by a desire to make the supreme experiment.

A week later the journey to Lourdes was decided upon. Pierre, however, had insisted on a final consultation of medical men in order to ascertain if it were really possible for Marie to travel; and this again was a seene which rose up before him, with certain incidents which he ever beheld whilst others were already fading from his mind. Two of the doctors who had formerly attended the patient, and one of whom believed in the rupture of certain ligaments, whilst the other asserted the case to be one of medulary paralysis, had ended by agreeing that this paralysis existed, and that there was also, possibly, some ligamentary injury, their opinion all the symmetric position this diagnosis, and the nature of the case seemed in them so evident that they did not hesitate to give certificates, each his own agreeing almost word for word with one another, and so positive in character as to leave no room for desirt. Moreover, they thought that the journey was practicable, though it would certainly prove an extremely painful one. Pierre thereupon resolved to risk it, for he had found the doctors very prudent, and very desirous to arrive at the truth; and he retained but a confused recollection of the third medical man who had been called in, a distant cousin of his named De Beauciair, who was young, extremely intelligent, but little known as yet, and said by some to be rather strange in his three controls. theories. This doctor, after looking at Marie for a long time, had asked somewhat annously about her parents, and had seemed greatly interested by what was told him of M. de Guersaint, this architect and inventor with a weak and exuberant mind. Then he had desired to measure the sufferer's visual field, and by a slight discreet touch had ascertained the locality of the pain, which, under certain pressure, seemed to ascend like a heavy shifting mass towards the breast. He did not appear to attach importance to the paralysis of the legs; but on a direct question being put to him he exclaimed that the girl ought to be taken to Lourdes and that she would assuredly be cured there, if she herself were convinced of it. Faith sufficed, said he, with a smile: two pious lady patients of his, whom he had sent thither during the preceding year, had returned in radiant health. He even predicted how the miracle would come about; it would be like a lightning stroke, an awakening, an exaltation of the entire being, whilst the evil, that horrid, diabolical weight which stifled the poor girl, would once more ascend and fly away as though emerging by her mouth. But at the same time he flatly declined to give a certificate. He had failed to agree with his two confrires, who treated him coldly, as though they considered him a wild, adventurous young fellow. Pierre confusedly remembered some shreds of the discussion which had begun again in his presence, some little part of the diagnosis framed by Beauelair, First, a dislocation of the organ, with a slight laceration of the ligaments, resulting from the patient's fall from her horse; then a slow healing, everything returing to its place, followed by consecutive nervous symptoms, so that the sufferer was now simply beset by her original fright, her attention fixed on the injured part, arrested there amidst increasing pain, incapable of acquiring fresh notions unless it were under the lash of some violent emotion. Morrower he also admitted the probability of accidents due to nutrition yet unexplained, and on the course and importance of which he himself would not venture to give an opinion. However the idea that Marie dreamt her disease, that the fearful sufferings torturing her came from an injury long since healed, appeared such a paradox to Pierre when he gazed at her and saw her in such agony, her limbs already stretched out lifeless on her bed of misery, that he did not even pause to consider it; but at that moment felt simply happy in the thought that all three doctors agreed in authorising the journey to Lourdes. To him it was sufficient that she might he cured, and to attain that result he would have followed her to the end of the world.

Ah! those last days of Paris, amid what a seramble they were spent! The national pilgrimage was about to start, and in order to avoid heavy expenses, it had occurred to him to obtain hospitalisation for Marie. Then he had been obliged to run about in order to obtain his own admission, as a helper, into the Hospitality of Our Lady of Salvation. M. de Guersaint was delighted with the prospect of the journey, for he was fond of nature, and ardently desired to hecome aquainted with the Pyrenees. Moreover, he did not allow anything to worry him, but was perfectly willing that the young priest should pay his railway fare, and provide for him at the hotel yonder as for a child; and his daughter Blanche, having slipped a twenty-frane piece into his hand at the last moment, he had even thought himself rich again. That poor brave Blanche had a little hidden store of her own, savings to the amount of fifty francs, which it had been absolutely necessary to accept, for she became quite angry in her determination to contribute towards her sister's cure, unable as she was to form one of the party, owing to the lessons which she had to give in Paris, whose hard pavements she must continue pacing, whilst her dear ones were kneeling yonder, amidst the enchantments of the Grotto. And so the others had started off, and were now rolling ever rolling along.

As they passed the station of Châtellerault a sudden burst of voices made Pierre start, and drove away the torpor into which his reverie had plunged him. What was the matter? Were they reaching Poitiers? But it was only half-past twelve o'clock, and it was simply Sister Hyaeinthe who had roused him, by making her patients and pilgrims say the Angelus, the three "Aves" thriee repeated. Then the voices burst forth, and the sound of a fresh eantiele arose, and continued like a lamentation. Fully five-and-twenty minutes must clapse before they would reach Poitiers, where it seemed as if the half-hour's stoppage would bring relief to every suffering! They were all so uncomfortable, so roughly shaken in that malodorous, burning earriage! Such wreteliedness was beyond endurance. Big tears coursed down the checks of Madame Vincent, a muttered oath escaped M. Sahathier, usually so resigned, and Brother Isidore, La Grivotte, and Madame Vêtu seemed to have become inanimate, mere waifs carried along by a torrent. Moreover, Marie no longer answered, but had closed her eves and would not open them, pursued as to place her inside the carriage again. So M. de Guersaint remained by himself on the platform, near the open door, smoking a cigarette, whilst Pierre hastened to the cantine van, where he knew he would find the doctor on duty, with his little travelling pharmacy.

32

Some other patients, whom one could not think of removing, also remained in the carriage. Amongst them was La Grivotte, who was stifling and almost delirious, in such a state indeed as to detain Madame de Jonquiére, who had arranged to meet her daughter Raymonde, with Madame Volmar and Madame Désagneaux, in the refreshment-room, in order that they might all four lunch together. But that unfortunate creature seemed on the point of expiring, so how could she leave her all alone on the hard seat of that carriage? On his side, M. Sabathier, likewise riveted to his seat, was waiting for his wife, who had gone to fetch a bunch of grapes for him; whilst Marthe had remained with her brother the missionary, whose faint moan never ceased. The others, those who were able to walk, had hustled one another in their haste to alight, all eager as they were to escape for a moment from that cage of wretchedness where their limbs had been quite numbed by the seven hours' journey which they had so far gone. Madame Maze had at once drawn apart, straying with inclancholy face to the far end of the platform, where she found herself all alone; Madame Vetu, stupefied by her sufferings, had found sufficient strength to take a few steps, and sit down on a bench, in the full sunlight, where she did not even feel the burning heat; whilst Elise Rouquet, who had had the decency to cover her face with a black wrap, and was consumed by a desire for fresh water, went hither and thither in search of a drinking fountain. And meantime Madame Vincent, walking slowly, carried her little Rose about in her arms, trying to smile at her, and to cheer her by showing her some gaudily coloured picture-bills, which the child gravely gazed at, but did not sec.

Pierre had the greatest possible difficulty to make his way through the crowd inundating the platform. No effort of imagination could enable one to picture the living torrent of ailing and healthy beings which the train had here set down-a mob of more than a thousand persons, just emerging from suffocation, and bustling, hurrying, hither and thither. Each carriage had contributed its share of wretchedness, like some hospital ward suddenly evacuated; and it was now possible to form an idea of the frightful amount of suffering which this terrible white train earried along with it, this train which disseminated a legend of horror wheresoever it passed. Some infirm sufferers were dragging themselves about, others were being carried, and many remained in a heap on the platform. There were sudden pushes, violent calls, innumerable displays of distracted eagerness to reach the refreshment-rooms and the buvette. Each and all made haste, going wheresoever their wants called them. This stoppage of half-anhour's duration, the only stoppage there would be before reaching Lourdes, was, after all, such a short one. And the only gay note, amidst all the black cassocks and the threadbare garments of the poor, never of any precise shade of colour, was supplied by the smiling whiteness of the Little Sisters of the Assumption, all bright and active in their snowy coifs, wimples and aprons.

POITIERS

When Pierre at last reached the cantine van near the middle of the train, he found it already besieged. There was here a petroleum stove, with a small supply of cooking utensils. The broth prepared from concentrated meat-extract was being warmed in wrought-iron pans, whilst the preserved milk in tins was diluted and supplied as occasion required. There were some other provisions, such as biscuits, fruit, and chocolate, on a few shelves. But Sister Saint-François, to whom the service was entrusted, a short, stout woman of five-and-forty, with a good-natured, fresh-coloured face, was somewhat losing her head in presence of all the hands so eagerly stretched towards her. Whilst continuing her distribution, she lent ear to Pierre, as he called the doctor, who with his travelling pharmacy occupied another corner of the van. when the young priest began to explain matters, speaking of the poor unknown man who was dying, a sudden desire came to her to go and see him, and she summoned another Sister to take her place.

"Oh! I wished to ask you, Sister, for some broth for a passenger who is ill," said Pierre, at that moment turning towards her.

"Very well, Monsieur l'Abbé, I will bring some. Go on in front."

The doctor and the Abbé went off in all haste, rapidly questioning and answering one another, whilst behind them followed Sister Saint-François, carrying the bowl of broth with all possible caution amidst the jostling of the crowd. The doctor was a dark-complexioned man of eight-and-twenty, robust and extremely handsome, with the head of a young Roman emperor, such as may still be occasionally met with in the sunburnt land of Provence. soon as Sister Hyacinthe caught sight of him, she raised an exclamation of surprise: "What! Monsieur Ferrand, is it you?" Indeed, they both seeined amazed at meeting in this manner.

It is however the courageous mission of the Sisters of the Assumption to tend the ailing poor, those who lie in agony in their humble garrets, and cannot pay for nursing; and thus these good women spend their lives among the wretched, installing themselves beside the sufferer's pallet in his tiny lodging, ministering to every want, attending to both cooking and cleaning, and living there like servants and relatives, until either cure or death supervenes. And it was in this wise that Sister Hyacinthe woung as she was, with her milky face, and her blue eyes w laughed, had installed herself one day in the abode of fellow, Ferrand, then a medical student, prostrated by typhoid fever, and so desperately poor that he lived in a kind of loft, under the roof, and reached by a ladder, in the Rue du Four. And from that moment she had not stirred from his side, but had remained with him until she cured him, with the passion of one who lived only for others, one who when an infant had been found in a church porch, and who had no other family than that of those who suffered, to whom she devoted herself with all her ardently affectionate nature. And what a delightful month, what exquisite comradeship, fraught with the pure fraternity of suffering, had followed! When he ealled her "Sister," it was really to a sister that he was speaking. And she was a mother also, a mother who helped him to rise, and who put him to bed as though he were her child, without aught springing up between them save supreme pity, the divine, gentle compassion of charity. She ever showed herself gay, sexless, devoid of any instinct excepting that which prompted her to assuage and to console. And he worshipped her, venerated her, and had retained of her the most chaste and passionate of recollections.

"O Sister Hyacinthel" he murmured in delight.

Chance alone had brought them face to face again, for Ferrand was not a believer, and if he found himself in that train it was simply because he had at the last moment consented to take the place of a friend who was suddenly prevented from coming. For nearly a twelvemonth now he had been a house-surgeon at the Hospital of La Pitié. However, this journey to Lourdes, in such peculiar circumstanees, greatly interested him.

The joy of meeting was making them forget the ailing stranger. And so the Sister resumed: "You see, Monsieur Ferrand, it is for this man that we want you. At one moment we thought him dead. Ever since we passed Amboise he has been filling us with fear, and I have just sent for the Holy Oils. Do you find him so very low? Could you not revive him a little?"

The doctor was already examining the man, and thereupon the sufferers who had remained in the carriage became greatly interested and began to look. Marie, to whom Sister Saint-François had given the bowl of broth, was holding it with such an unsteady hand that Pierre had to take it from her, and endeavour to make her drink; but she could not swallow, and she left the broth searce tasted, fixing her eyes upon the man, waiting to see what would happen like one whose own existence is at stake.
"Tell me," again asked Sister Hyacinthe, "how do you find him?

What is his illness?"

"What is his illness!" muttered Ferrand; "he has every illness." Then, drawing a little phial from his pocket, he endeavoured to introduce a few drops of the contents between the sufferer's clenched teeth. The man heaved a sigh, raised his eyelids and let them fall again: that was all, he gave no other sign of life.

Sister Hyacinthe, usually so calm and composed, so little accustomed to despair, became impatient. "But it is terrible," said she, "and Sister Claire des Anges does not come back! Yet I told her plainly enough where she would find Father Massias's carriage. Mon Dieu! what will become of us?"

Sister Saint-François, seeing that she could render no help, was now about to return to the cantine van. Before doing so, however, she inquired if the man were not simply dying of hunger; for such cases presented themselves, and indeed she had only come to the compartment with the view of offering some of her provisions. At last, as she went off, she promised that she would make Sister Claire des Anges hasten her return should she happen to meet her; and she had not gone twenty yards when she turned round and waved her arm to call attention to her colleague, who with discreet short steps was coming back alone.

Leaning out of the window, Sister Hyacinthe kept on calling to her, "Make haste, make haste! Well, and where is Father Massias?"

"He isn't there." "What! not there?"

"No. I went as fast as I could, but with all these people about it was not possible to get there quickly. When I reached the carriage Father Massias had already alighted, and gone out of the station, no doubt.'

She thereupon explained, that according to what she had heard, Father Massias and the priest of Sainte-Radegonde had some appointment together. In other years, the national pilgrimage halted at Poitiers for four-and-twenty hours, and after those who were ill had been placed in the town hospital the others went in procession to Sainte-Radegonde. That year, however, there was some obstacle to this course being followed, so the train was going straight on to Lourdes; and Father Massias was certainly with his friend the priest, talking with him on some matter of

"They promised to tell him and send him here with the Holy Oils as soon as they found him," added Sister Claire.

However, this was quite a disaster for Sister Hyacinthe, Since

The church of Sainte-Radegonde, built by the saint of that name in the sixth century, is famous throughout Poitou. In the crypt between the tombs of St. Agnes and St. Disciole is that of St. Radegonde herself, but it now only contains some particles of her remains, as the greater portion was burnt by the Huguenots in 1562. On a previous occasion (1412) the tomb had been violated by Jean, Duke de Berry, who wished to remove both the saint's head and her two rings. Whilst he was making the attempt, however, the skeleton is said to have withdrawn its hand so that he might not possess himself of the rings. A greater curiosity which the church contains is a footprint on stone slab, said to have been left by Christian a footprint on stone slab, said to have been left by Christian from many parts.—Trans

Science was powerless, perhaps the Holy Oils would have brought the sufferer some relief. She had often seen that happen. .

"O Sister, Sister, how worried I am!" she said to her companion. "Do you know, I wish you would go back and watch for Father Massias, and bring him to me as soon as you see him. It would be so kind of you to do sol"
"Yes, Sister," compliantly answered Sister Claire des Anges, and off she went again with that grave, mysterious air of hers, wending her way through the crowd like a gliding shadow.

.Ferrand, meantime, was still looking at the man, sorely distressed at his inability to please Sister Hyacinthe by reviving him. And as he made a gesture expressive of his powerlessness she again raised her voice entreatingly: "Stay with me, Monsieur Ferrand, pray stay," she said. "Wait till Father Massias comes—I shall be a little more at ease with you here."

· He remained and helped her to raise the man, who was slipping down upon the seat. Then, taking a linen cloth, she wiped the poor-fellow's face which a dense perspiration was continually covering. And the spell of waiting continued amid the uneasiness of the patients who had remained in the earriage, and the euriosity of the folks who had begun to assemble on the platform in front of the compartment.

All at once, however, a girl hastily pushed the crowd aside, and, mounting on the footboard, addressed herself to Madame de Jonquière: "What is the matter, mamma?" she said. "They are waiting for you in the refreshment-room."

It was Raymonde de Jonquière, who, already somewhat ripe for her five-and-twenty years, was remarkably like her mother, being very dark, with a pronounced nose, large mouth, and full, pleasant-looking face.

"But, my dear, you can see for yourself. I can't leave this poor woman," replied the lady-hospitaller; and thereupon she pointed to La Grivotte, who had been attacked by a fit of coughing which shook her frightfully.

"Oh, how annoying, mammal" retorted Raymonde, "Madame Désagneaux and Madame Volmar were looking forward with so inucli pleasure to this little lunch together."

"Well, it can't be helped, my dear. At all events, you can begin without waiting for me. Tell the ladies that I will come and join them as soon as I can." Then, an idea occurring to her, Madame de Jonquière added: "Wait a moment, the doctor is here. I will try to get him to take charge of my patient. Go back, I will follow you. As you can gness, I am dying of hunger."

Raymonde briskly returned to the refreshment-room whilst her mother begged Ferrand to come into her compartment to see if he could do something to relieve La Grivotte. At Marthe's request he had already examined Brother Isidore, whose moaning never ceased; and with a sorrowful gesture he had again confessed his powerlessness. However, he hastened to comply with Madame de Jonquière's appeal, and raised the consumptive woman to a sitting posture in the hope of thus stopping her cough, which indeed gradually ceased. And then he helped the lady-hospitaller to make her swallow a spoonful of some soothing draught. The doctor's presence in the carriage was still causing a stir among the ailing ones. M. Sabathier, who was slowly eating the grapes which his wife had been to fetch for him, did not however question Ferrand, for he knew full well what his answer would be, and was weary, as he expressed it, of consulting all the princes of seience; nevertheless he felt comforted as it were at seeing him set that poor consumptive woman on her feet again. And even Marie watched all that the doctor did with increasing interest, though not daring to call him herself, certain as she also was that he could do nothing for her.

Meantime, the crush on the platform was increasing. Only a quarter of an hour now remained to the pilgrims. Madame Vêtu, whose eyes were open but who saw nothing, sat like an insensible being in the broad sunlight, in the hope possibly that the scorching heat would deaden her pains; whilst up and down, in front of her, went Madame Vincent ever with the same sleep-inducing step and ever carrying her little Rosc, her poor ailing birdie whose weight was so trifling that she scarcely felt her in her arms. Many people meantime were hastening to the water tap in order to fill their pitchers, cans, and bottles. Madame Maze, who was of refined tastes and careful of her person, thought of going to wash her hands there; but just as she arrived she found Elise Rouquet drinking, and she recoiled at sight of that disease-smitten face, so terribly disfigured and robbed of nearly all semblance of humanity. And all the others likewise shuddered, likewise hesitated to fill their bottles, pitchers, and cans at the tap from which she had

A large number of pilgrims had now begun to eat whilst pacing the platform. You could hear the rhythmical taps of the crutches carried by a woman who incessantly wended her way through the groups. On the ground, a legless cripple was painfully dragging hcrself about in search of nobody knew what. Others, seated there in hcaps, no longer stirred. All these sufferers, momentarily unpacked as it were, these patients of a travelling hospital emptied for a brief half-hour, were taking the air amidst the bewilderment and agitation of the healthy passengers; and the whole throng had a frightfully woeful, poverty-stricken appearance in the broad noontide light.

Pierre no longer stirred from the side of Marie, for M. de Guersaint had disappeared, attracted by a verdant patch of land-scape which could be seen at the far end of the state and, feeling anxious about her, since she had not been able broth, the young priest with a smiling air tried to tem by offering to go and buy her a peach; but she refused it; she was suffering too much, she cared for nothing. She was gazing at him with her large, woeful eyes, on the one hand impatient at this stoppage which delayed her chance of cure, and on the other terrified at the thought of again being jolted along that hard and endless railroad.

Just then a stout gentleman whose full beard was turning grey, and who had a broad, fatherly kind of face, drew near and touched Pierre's arm: "Excuse me, Monsieur l'Abbé," said he, "but'is it not in this carriage that there is a poor man dying?"

And on the priest returning an affirmative answer, the gentleman became quite affable and familiar. "My name is Vigneron," he said; "I am a head clerk at the Ministry of Finances, and applied for leave in order that I might help my wife to take our son Gustave to Lourdes. The dear lad places all his hope in the Blessed Virgin, to whom we pray morning and evening on his behalf. We are in a second-class compartment of the carriage just in front of yours."

Then, turning round, he summoned his party with a wave of the hand. "Come, come!" said he, "it is here. The unfortunate man is indeed in the last throes."

Madame Vigneron was a little woman with the correct bearing of a respectable bourgeoise, but her long livid face denoted impoverished blood, terrible evidence of which was furnished by her son Gustave. The latter, who was fifteen years of age, looked scarcely ten. Twisted out of shape, he was a mere skeleton, with his right leg so wasted, so reduced, that he had to walk with a crutch. He had a small thin face, somewhat awry, in which one saw little excepting his eyes, elear eyes, sparkling with intelligence, sharpened as it were by suffering, and doubtless well able to dive into the human soul.

An old puffy-faced lady followed the others, dragging her legs along with difficulty; and M. Vigneron, remembering that he had forgotten her, stepped back towards Pierre so that he might complete the introduction. "That lady," said he, "is Madame Chaise, my wife's eldest sister. She also wished to accompany Gustave, whom she is very fond of." And then, leaning forward, he added in a whisper, with a confidential air, "She is the widow of Chaise, the silk merchant, you know, who left such an immense fortune. She is suffering from a heart complaint which causes her much anxiety."

The whole family, grouped together, then gazed with lively curiosity at what was taking place in the railway earriage. People were incessantly flocking to the spot; and so that the lad might be the better able to see, his father took him up in his arms for a moment, whilst his aunt held the crutch and his mother on her side raised herself on tip-toe.

The scene in the carriage was still the same; the strange man was still stiffly seated in his corner, his head resting against the hard wood. He was livid, his eyes were closed, and his mouth was twisted by suffering; and every now and then Sister Hyacinthe with her linen cloth wiped away the cold sweat which was constantly covering his face. She no longer spoke, no longer evinced any impatience, but had recovered her serenity and relied on Heaven. From time to time she would simply glance towards the platform to see if Father Massias were not coming.

"Look at him, Gustave," said M. Vigneron to his son; "he must be consumptive.

The lad, whom scrofula was eating away, whose hip was attacked by an abscess, and in whom there were already signs of necrosis of the vertebræ, seemed to take a passionate interest in the agony he thus beheld. It did not frighten him, he smiled at it with a smile of infinite sadness.

"Oh! how dreadful!" muttered Madame Chaise, who, living in continual terror of a sudden attack which would carry her off, turned pale with the fear of death.

"Ah! well," replied M. Vigneron philosophically, "it will come to each of us in turn. We are all mortal.'

Thereupon, a painful mocking expression came over Gustave's smile, as though he had heard other words than those-perchance an unconscious wish, the hope that the old aunt might die before he himself did, that he would inherit the promised half-million of francs, and then not long encumber his family.

of francs, and then not long encumber his family.

"Put the boy down now," said Madame Vigneron to her husband.

"You are tiring him, holding him by the legs like that."

Then both she and Madamc Chaise bestirred themselves in order that the lad might not be shaken. The poor darling was so much in need of care and attention. At each moment they feared that they might lose him. Even his father was of opinion that they had better put him in the train again at once. And as the two women went off with the child, the old gentleman once more turned towards Pierre, and with evident emotion exclaimed: "Ah! Monsieur l'Abbé, if God should take him from us, the light of our life would be extinguished—I don't speak of his aunt's fortune, which would go to other nephews. But it would be unnatural, would it not, that he should go off before her, especially as she is so ill? However, we are all in the hands of Providence, and place our reliance in the Blessed Virgin, who will assuredly perform a miracle."

Just then Madame de Jonquière, having been reassured by Doctor Ferrand, was able to leave La Grivotte. Before going off, however, she took care to say to Pierre: "I am dying of hunger and am going to the refreshment-room for a moment. Providing my patient should begin eoughing again, pray come and from the should begin eoughing again, pray come and from the should begin eoughing again, pray come and from the should begin eoughing again, pray come and from the should be sh

When, after great difficulty, she had managed to conform and reach the refreshment-room, she found h midst of another seramble. The better circumstanced pilgrims had taken the tables by assault, and a great many priests were to be seen hastily lunching amidst all the elatter of knives, forks, and crockery. The three or four waiters were not able to attend to all requirements, especially as they were hampered in their movements by the crowd purchasing fruit, bread, and cold meat at the counter. It was at a little table at the far end of the room that Raymonde was lunching with Madame Désagneaux and Madame Volmar.

"Ah! here you are at last, manimal" the girl exclaimed, as Madame de Jonquière approached. "I was just going back to fetch you. You certainly ought to be allowed time to eat!"

She was laughing, with a very animated expression on her face, quite delighted as she was with the adventures of the journey and this indifferent, serambling meal. "There," said she, "I have kept you some trout with green sauce, and there's a cutlet also waiting for you. We have already got to the artichokes."

Then everything became charming. The gaiety prevailing in that little corner rejoiced the sight.

Young Madame Désagneaux was particularly adorable. A delicate blonde, with wild wavy, yellow hair, a round, dimpled, milky face, a gay, laughing disposition, and a remarkably good heart, she had made a rich marriage, and for three years past had been wont to leave her husband at Trouville in the fine August weather, in order to accompany the national pilgrimage as a lady-hospitaller. This was her great passion, an access of quivering pity, a longing desire to place herself unreservedly at the disposal of the sick for hive days, a real debauch of devotion from which she returned tired to death, but full of intense delight. Her only regret was that she as yet had no ehildren, and with comical passion, she occasionally expressed a regret that she had missed her true vocation, that of a sister of charity.

"Ah! my dear," she hastily said to Raymonde, "don't pity your mother for being so much taken up with her patients. She, at all events, has something to occupy her." And addressing herself to Madame de Jonquière, she added: "If you only knew how long we find the time in our fine first-class carriage. We cannot even occupy ourselves with a little needlework, as it is forbidden. asked for a place with the patients, but all were already distributed, so that my only resource will be to try to sleep to-night."

She began to laugh, and then resumed: "Yes, Madame Volmar, we will try to sleep, won't we, since talking seems to tire you?" Madame Volmar, who looked over thirty, was very dark, with a long face and delicate but drawn features. Her magnificent eyes shone out like brasiers, though every now and then a cloud seemed to veil and extinguish them. At the first glance she did not appear, beautiful, but as you gazed at her she became more and more perturbing, till she conquered you and inspired you with passionate admiration. It should be said though that she shrank from all self-assertion, comporting herself with much modesty, ever keeping in the background, striving to hide her lustre, invariably clad in black and unadorned by a single jewel, although she was the wife of a Parisian diamond-merchant.

"Ohl for my part," she murmured, "as long as I am not hustled too much I am well pleased."

She had been to Lourdes as an auxiliary lady helper already on two occasions, though but little had been seen of her there—at the hospital of Our Lady of Dolours—as, on arriving, she had been overcome by such great fatigue that she had been forced, she said, to keep her room.

However Madame de Jonquière, who managed the ward, treated her with good-natured tolerance. "Ah! my poor friends," said she, "there will be plenty of time for you to exert yourselves. Get to sleep if you can, and your turn will come when I can no longer keep up." Then addressing her daughter she resumed: "And you would do well, darling, not to excite yourself too much if you wish to keep your head clear."

Raymonde smiled and gave her mother a reproachful glance: "Mamma, mamma, why do you say that? Am I not sensible?" she asked.

Doubtless she was not boasting, for despite her youthful, thoughtless air, the air of one who simply feels happy in living, there appeared in her grey eyes an expression of firm resolution, a resolution to shape her life for herself.

"It is true," the mother confessed with a little confusion, "this little girl is at times more sensible than I am myself. Come, pass me the cutlet—it is welcome, I assure you. Lord! how hungry

I was

The meal continued, enlivened by the constant laughter of Madame Désagneaux and Raymonde. The latter was very animated, and her face, which was already growing somewhat yellow through long pining for a suitor again assumed the rosy bloom of twenty. They had to cat very fast, for only ten minutes now remained to them. On all sides one heard the growing tumult of customers who feared that they would not have time to take their coffee.

All at once, however, Pierre made his appearance: a fit of stiffing had again come over La Grivotte; and Madame de Jonquiére hastily finished her artichoke and returned to her compartment, after kissing her daughter, who wished her "good night" in a facetious way. The priest, however, had made a movement of surprise on perceiving Madame Volmar with the red cross of the lady-hospitallers on her black bodice. He knew her, for he still called at long intervals on old Madame Volmar, the diamond-merchant's mother, who had been one of his own mother's friends. She was the most terrible woman in the world, religious beyond all reason, so harsh and stern, moreover, as to close the very window-shutters in order to prevent her daughter-in-law from looking into the street. And he knew the young woman's story, how she had been imprisoned on the very morrow of her marriage, shut up between her mother-in-law, who tyrannised over her, and her husband, a repulsively ugly monster, who went so far as to beat her, mad as he was with jealousy, although he himself kept mistresses. The unhappy woman was not allowed out of the house, excepting it were to go to mass. And one day, at La Trinité, Pierre had surprised her secret, on seeing her behind the church exchanging a few hasty words with a well-groomed, distinguished-looking man.

The priest's sudden appearance in the refreshment-room had somewhat disconcerted Madame Volmar.

"What an unexpected meeting Monsieur l'Abbèl" she said, offering him her long, warm hand. "What a long time it is since I last saw youl" And thereupon she explained that this was the third year she had gone to Lourdes, her mother-in-law having required her to join the Association of Our Lady of Salvation. "It is surprising that you did not see her at the station when we started," she added. "She sees me into the train and comes to meet me on my return.'

This was said in an apparently simple way, but with such a subtle touch of irony that Pierre fancied he could guess the truth. He knew that she really had no religious principles at all, and that she merely followed the rites and ceremonies of the Church in order that she might now and again obtain an hour's freedom; and all at once he intuitively realised that some one must be waiting for her younder, that it was for the purpose of meeting him that she was thus hastening to Lourdes with her shrinking yet ardent air and flaming eyes, which she so prudently shrouded with a veil of lifeless indifference.

"For my part," he answered, "I am accompanying a friend of my childhood, a poor girl who is very ill indeed. I must ask your help for her; you shall nurse her."

Thereupon she faintly blushed, and he no longer doubted the truth of his surmise. However, Raymonde was just then settling the bill with the easy assurance of a girl who is expert in figures; and immediately afterwards Madame Désagneaux led Madame Volmar away. The waiters were now growing more distracted and the tables were fast being vacated; for, on hearing a bell ring, everybody had begun to rush towards the door.

Pierre, on his side, was hastening back to his carriage, when he was stopped by an old priest. "Ahl Monsieur le Curé," he said, "I saw you just before we started, but I was unable to get near enough to shake hands with you."

Thereupon he offered his hand to his brother ecclesiastic, who was looking and smiling at him in a kindly way. The Abbé

Judaine was the parish priest of Saligny, a little village in the department of the Oise. Tall and sturdy, he had a broad pink face, around which elustered a mass of white eurly hair, and it could be divined by his appearance that he was a worthy man whom neither the flesh nor the spirit had ever tormented. He believed firmly and absolutely, with a tranquil godliness, never having known a struggle, endowed as he was with the ready faith of a child unacquainted with human passions. And ever since the Virgin at Lourdes had cured him of a disease of the eyes, by a famous miraele which folks still talked about, his belief had become yet more absolute and tender, as though impregnated with divine gratitude.

"I am pleased that you are with us, my friend," he gently said; "for there is much in these pilgrimages for young priests to profit by. I am told that some of them at times experience a feeling of rebellion. Well, you will see all these poor people praying-it is a sight which will make you weep. How can one do otherwise than place oneself in God's hands, on seeing so much suffering cured or consoled?"

The old priest himself was accompanying a patient; and he pointed to a first-class compartment, at the door of which hung a placard bearing the inscription: "M. l'Abbé Judaine. Reserved." Then lowering his voice, he said: "It is Madame Dieulafay, you know, the great banker's wife. Their château, a royal domain, is in my parish, and when they learned that the Blessed Virgin had vouchsafed me such an undeserved favour, they begged me to intereede for their poor sufferer. I have already said several masses, and most sineerely pray for her. There, you see her vonder on the ground. She insisted on being taken out of the carriage, in spite of all the trouble which one will have to place her in it again."

On a shady part of the platform, into kind of long box, there was, as the old priest said, a woman whose beautiful, perfectly oval face, lighted up by splendid eyes, denoted no greater age than six-and-twenty. She was suffering from a frightful disease. The disappearance from her system of the calcareous salts had led to a softening of the osseous framework, the slow destruction of her bones. Three years previously, after the advent of a stillborn child, she had felt vague pains in the spinal column. And then, little by little, her bones had rarefied and lost shape, the vertebræ had sunk, the bones of the pelvis had flattened, and those of the arms and legs had contracted. Thus shrunken, melting away as it were, she had become a mere human remnant, a nameless fluid thing, which could not be set ereet, but had to be carried hither and thither with infinite care, for fear lest she should vanish between one's fingers. Her face, a motionless face, on which sat a stupefied, imbeeile expression, still retained its beauty of outline, and yet it was impossible to gaze at this wretched shred of a woman without feeling a heart-pang, the keener on account of all the luxury surrounding her; for not only was the box in which she lay lined with blue quilted silk, but she was covered with valuable lace, and a cap of rare valenciennes was set upon her head, her wealth thus being proclaimed, displayed, in the midst of her awful agony.

"Ahl how pitiable it is," resumed the Abbé Judaine in an undertone. "To think that she is so young, so pretty, possessed of millions of money! And if you knew how dearly loved she was, with what adoration she is still surrounded. That tall gentleman near her is her husband, that elegantly dressed lady is her sister, Madame Jousseur."

Pierre remembered having often noticed in the newspapers the name of Madame Jousseur, wife of a diplomatist, and a conspicuous member of the higher spheres of Catholic society in Paris. People had even circulated a story of some great passion which she had fought against and vanquished. She also was very pretily dressed, with marvellously tasteful simplicity, and she ministered to the wants of her sorry sister with an air of perfect devotion. As for the unhappy woman's husband, who at the age of five-and-thirty had inherited his father's colossal business, he was a clear-complexioned, well-groomed, handsome man, clad in a closely buttoned frock-coat. His cycs, however, were full of tears, for he adored his wife, and had left his business in order to take her to Lourdes, placing his last hope in this appeal to the mercy of Heaven.

Ever since the morning, Pierre had beheld many frightful sufferings in that woeful white train. But none had so distressed his soul as did that wretched female skeleton, slowly liquefying in the midst of its lace and its millions. "The unhappy woman!"

he murmured with a shudder.

The Abbé Judaine however made a gesture of screne hope. "The Blessed Virgin will cure her," said he; "I have prayed to her so much.

Just then a bell again pealed, and this time it was really the signal for starting. Only two minutes remained. There was a last rush, and folks hurried back towards the train carrying eatables wrapped in paper, and bottles and cans which they had filled with water. Several of them quite lost their heads, and in their inability to find their carriages, ran distractedly from one to the other end of the train; whilst some of the infirm ones dragged themselves about amidst the precipitate tapping of crutches, and others, only able to walk with difficulty, strove to hasten their steps whilst leaning on the arms of some of the lady-hospitallers. It was only with infinite difficulty that four men managed to replace Madame Diculafay in her first-class compartment. The Vignerons, who were content with second-class accommodation, had already reinstalled themselves in their quarters amidst an extraordinary heap of baskets, boxes, and valises which scarcely allowed little Gustav enough room to stretch his poor, puny limbs—the limbs as it were of a deformed insect. And then all the women appeared again: Madame Maze gliding along in silence; Madame Vincent raising her dear little girl in her outstretched arms and dreading lest she should hear her cry out; Madame Vêtu, whom it had been necessary to push into the train, after rousing her from her stupefying torment; and Elise Rouquet, who was quite drenched through her obstinacy in endeavouring to drink from the tap, and was still wiping her monstrous face. Whilst each returned to her place and the carriage filled once more, Marie listened to her father, who had come back delighted with his stroll to a pointsman's little house beyond the station, whence a really pleasant stretch of landscape could be discerned.

"Shall we lay you down again at once?" asked Pierre, sorely distressed by the pained expression on Marie's face.

"Oh no, no, by-and-by!" she replied. "I shall have plenty of time to hear those wheels roaring in my head as though they were grinding my bones."

Then as Ferrand seemed on the point of returning to the cantine van, Sister Hyacinthe begged him to take another look at the strange man before he went off. She was still waiting for Father Massias, astonished at the inexplicable delay in his arrival, but not yet without hope, as Sister Claire des Anges had not returned.

"Pray, Monsieur Ferrand," said she, "tell me if this unfortunate man is in any immediate danger."

The young doctor again looked at the sufferer, felt him, and listened to his breathing. Then with a gesture of discouragement he answered in a low voice, "I feel convinced that you will not get him to Lourdes alive."

Every head was still anxiously stretched forward. If they had only known the man's name, the place he had come from, who he was! But it was impossible to extract a word from this unhappy stranger, who was about to die, there, in that carriage, without anybody being able to give his face a name!

It suddenly occurred to Sister Hyacinthe to have him searched. Under the circumstances there could certainly be no harm in such a course. "Feel in his pockets, Monsieur Ferrand," she said.

The doctor thereupon searched the man in a gentle, cautious way, but the only things that he found in his pockets were a chaplet, a knife, and three sous. And nothing more was ever learnt of the man.

At that moment, however, a voice announced that Sister Claire des Anges was at last coming back with Father Massias. All this while the latter had simply been chetting with the Sainte-Radegonde in one of the waiting-rooms. Keen emotion attended his arrival; for a moment all seemed saved. But the train was about to start, the porters were already closing the carriage doors, and it was necessary that extreme-unction should be administered in all haste, in order to avoid too long a delay.

"This way, mon reverend perel" exclaimed Sister Hyacinthe;

"yes, yes, pray come in, our unfortunate patient is here.

Father Massias, who was five years older than Pierre, whose fellow-student however he had been at the seminary, had a tall, spare figure, with an ascetic countenance framed round with a light-coloured beard and vividly lighted up by burning eyes. He was neither the priest harassed by doubt, nor the priest with child-like faith, but an apostle carried away by his passion, ever ready to fight and vanquish for the pure glory of the Blessed Virgin. In his black cloak with its large hood, and his broadbrimmed, flossy hat, he shone resplendently with the perpetual ardour of battle.

He immediately took from his pocket the silver case containing the Holy Oils, and the ceremony began whilst the last earriage doors were being slammed and belated pilgrims were rushing back to the train; the station-master, meantime, anxiously glancing at the clock and realising that it would be necessary for him to grant a few minutes' grace.

"Credo in unum Deum," hastily murmured the Father.

"Amen," replied Sister Hyacinthe and the other occupants of the carriage.

Those who had been able to do so had knelt upon the seats, whilst the others joined their hands, or repeatedly made the sign of the cross; and when the murmured prayers were followed by the Litanies of the ritual, every voice rose, an ardent desire for the remission of the man's sins and for his physical and spiritual eure winging its flight heavenward with each successive Kyric eleison. Might his whole life, of which they knew nought, be forgiven him; might he enter, stranger though he was, in triumph into the Kingdom of Godl

"Christe, exaudi nos."

"Ora pro nobis, sancta Dei Genitrix."

Father Massias had pulled out the silver needle from which hung a drop of holy oil. In the midst of such a scramble, with the whole train waiting—many people now thrusting their heads out of the carriage windows in surprise at the delay in starting—he could not think of following the usual practice, of annointing in turn all the organs of the senses, those portals of the soul which give admittance to evil. He must content himself, as the rules authorised him to do in pressing cases, with one anointment; and this he made upon the man's lips, those livid parted lips from between which only a faint breath escaped, whilst the rest of his face, with its lowered eyelids, already seemed indistinct, again merged into the dust of the earth.

"Per istam sanctam unctionem," said the Father, "et suam piissimam misericordiam, indulgeat tibi Dominus quidquid per

visum, auditum, odoratum, gustum, tactum, deliquisti."1

The remainder of the ceremony was lost amid the hurry and scramble of the departure. Father Massias scarcely had time to wipe off the oil with the little piece of cotton wool which Sister Hyacinthe held in readiness, before he had to leave the compartment and get into his own as fast as possible, setting the case containing the Holy Oils in order as he did so, whilst the pilgrims finished repeating the final prayer.

"We cannot wait any longer! It is impossible!" repeated the station-master as he bustled about. "Come, come, make haste evervhody!"

At last then they were about to resume their journey. Everybody sat down, returned to his or her corner again. Madame de Jonquière, however, had changed her place, in order to be nearer La Grivotte, whose condition still worried her, and she was now seated in front of M. Sabathier, who remained waiting with silent resignation. Moreover, Sister Hyacinthe, had not returned to her compartment, having decided to remain near the unknown man so that she might watch over him and help him. By following this course, too, she was able to minister to Brother 'Isidore, whose sufferings his sister Marthe was at a loss to assuage. And Marie, turning pale, felt the jolting of the train in her ailing flesh, even before it had resumed its journey under the heavy sun, rolling onward once more with its load of sufferers stifling in the pestilential atmosphere of the over-heated carriages.

At last a loud whistle resounded, the engine puffed, and Sister

Hyacinthe rose up to say: "The Magnificat, my children!"

IV

MIRACLES

Just as the train was beginning to move, the door of the compartment in which Pierre and Marie found themselves was opened and a porter pushed a girl of fourteen inside, saying: "There's a seat here-make haste!"

&lt;sup>1</sup>Through this holy unction and His most tender mercy may the Lord pardon thee whatever sins thou hast committed by thy sight, hearing ac &c

The others were already pulling long faces and were about to protest, when Sister Hyacinthe exclaimed: "What, is it you, Sophie? So you are going back to see the Blessed Virgin who cured you last year!"

And at the same time Madame de Jonquière remarked "Ah! Sophie, my little friend, I am very pleased to see that you are

"Why, yes, Sister! why, yes, madame," answered the girl, in a

The carriage door had already been closed again, so that it was necessary that they should accept the presence of this new pilgrim who had fallen from heaven as it were at the very moment when the train, which she had almost missed, was starting off again. She was a slender damsel and would not take up much room. Moreover, these ladies knew her, and all the patients had turned their eyes upon her on hearing that the Blessed Virgin had been pleased to cure her. They had now got beyond the station, the engine was still puffing, whilst the wheels increased their speed, and Sister Hyacinthe, clapping her hands, repeated: "Come, come, my children, the Magnificat."

Whilst the joyful chant arose amidst the jolting of the train, Pierre gazed at Sophie. She was evidently a young peasant girl, the daughter of some poor husbandman of the vicinity of Poitiers, petted by her parents, treated in fact like a young lady since she had become the object of a miracle, one of the elect, whom the priest of the district flocked to see. She wore a straw hat with pink ribbons, and a grey woollen dress trimmed with a flounce. Her round face although not pretty was a very pleasant one, with a beautifully fresh complexion, and clear, intelligent eyes which lent her a smiling, modest air.

When the Magnificat had been sung Pierre was unable to resist his desire to question Sophie. A child of her age, with so candid an air, so utterly unlike a liar, greatly interested him.

"And so you nearly missed the train, my child?" he said.

"I should have heen much ashamed if I had, Monsieur I'Abbé," "I had been at the station since twelve o'clock. she replied. And all at once I saw his reverence the priest of Sainte-Radegonde, who knows me well and who ealled me to him, to kiss me and tell me that it was very good of me to go hack to Lourdes. But it seems the train was starting and I only just had time to run on to the platform. Oh! I ran so fast!"

She pansed, laughing, still slightly out of breath, but already repenting that she had been so giddy.

"And what is your name, my child?" asked Pierre.

"Sophie Conteau, Monsieur l'Abbè."

"You do not belong to the town of Poitiers?"

"Oh no! certainly not. We belong to Vivonne, which is seven kilometres away. My father and mother have a little land there, and things would not be so bad if there were not eight children at home—I am the fifth—fortunately the four elder ones are beginning to work."

"And you, my ehild, what do you do?"

"I, Monseiur l'Abbél Oh! I am no great help. Since last year, when I came home cured, I have not been left quite a single day, for, as you can understand, so many people have come to see me, and then too I have been taken to Monseigneur's, and to the convents and all manner of other places. And before all that I was a long time ill. I could not walk without a stick, and each step I took made me cry out, so dreadfully did my foot hurt me."

"So it was of some injury to the foot that the Blessed Virgin eured you?"

Sophie did not have time to reply, for Sister Hyaeinthe, who was listening, intervened: "Of caries of the bones of the left heel, which had been going on for three years," said she. "The foot was swollen and quite deformed, and there were fistulas giving.

egress to eontinual suppuration."

On hearing this, all the sufferers in the carriage became intensely interested. They no longer took their eyes off this little girl on whom a miraele had been performed, but scanned her from head to foot as though seeking for some sign of the prodigy. Those who were able to stand rose up in order that they might the better see her, and the others, the infirm ones stretched on their mattresses, strove to raise themselves and turn their heads. Amidst the suffering which had again come upon them on leaving Poitiers, the terror which filled them at the thought that they must continue rolling onward for another fifteen hours, the sudden advent of this child, favoured by Heaven, was like a divine relief, a ray of hope whence they would derive sufficient strength to accomplish the remainder of their terrible journey. The moaning had abated somewhat already, and every face was turned towards the girl with an ardent desire to believe.

This was especially the case with Marie, who, already reviving, joined her trembling hands, and in a gentle supplicating voice said to Pierre. "Question her, pray question her, ask her to tell us everything—cured, O God! cured of such a terrible complaint!"

Madame de Jonquière, who was quite affected, had leant over the partition to kiss the girl. "Certainly," said she, "our little friend will tell you all about it. Won't you, my darling? You will tell us what the Blessed Virgin did for you?"

"Oh, certainly! madame—as much as you like," answered Sophic with her smiling, modest air, her eyes gleaming with intelligence. Indeed, she wished to begin at once, and raised her right hand with a pretty gesture, as a sign to everybody to be attentive.

&lt;sup>1</sup>The Bishop's residence.

The others were already pulling long faces and were about to protest, when Sister Hyaeinthe exclaimed: "What, is it you, Sophie? So you are going back to see the Blessed Virgin who cured you last year!"

And at the same time Madame de Jonquière remarked "Ah! Sophie, my little friend, I am very pleased to see that you are grateful."

"Why, yes, Sister! why, yes, madame," answered the girl, in a

The earriage door had already been closed again, so that it was necessary that they should accept the presence of this new pilgrim who had fallen from heaven as it were at the very moment when the train, which she had almost missed, was starting off again. She was a slender damsel and would not take up much room. Moreover, these ladies knew her, and all the patients had turned their eyes upon her on hearing that the Blessed Virgin had been pleased to cure her. They had now got beyond the station, the engine was still puffing, whilst the wheels increased their speed, and Sister Hyaeinthe, clapping her hands, repeated: "Come, come, my ehildren, the Magnificat.'

Whilst the joyful chant arose amidst the jolting of the train, Pierre gazed at Sophie. She was evidently a young peasant girl, the daughter of some poor husbandman of the vicinity of Poitiers, petted by her parents, treated in fact like a young lady since she had become the object of a miracle, one of the elect, whom the priest of the district flocked to see. She wore a straw hat with pink ribbons, and a grey woollen dress trimmed with a flounce. Her round face although not pretty was a very pleasant one, with a beautifully fresh complexion, and clear, intelligent eyes which lent her a smiling, modest air.

When the Magnificat had been sung Pierre was unable to resist his desire to question Sophie. A child of her age, with so candid an air, so utterly unlike a liar, greatly interested him.

"And so you nearly missed the train, my child?" he said. "I should have been much ashamed if I had, Monsieur I'Abbé," she replied. "I had been at the station since twelve o'clock. And all at once I saw his reverence the priest of Sainte-Rade-gonde, who knows me well and who ealled me to him, to kiss me and tell me that it was very good of me to go back to Lourdes. But it seems the train was starting and I only just had time to run on to the platform. Oh! I ran so fast!"

She paused, laughing, still slightly out of breath, but already repenting that she had been so giddy.

And what is your name, my child?" asked Pierre.

"Sophic Couteau, Monsieur l'Abbè."

"You do not belong to the town of Poitiers?"

"Oh no! certainly not. We belong to Vivonne, which is seven kilometres away. My father and mother have a little land there, nd things would not be so bad if there were not eight children t home—I am the fifth—fortunately the four elder ones are begining to work."

"And you, my ehild, what do you do?"

"I, Monseiur l'Abbé! Oh! I am no great help. Since last tear, when I came home eured, I have not been left quite a ingle day, for, as you ean understand, so many people have come o see me, and then too I have been taken to Monseigneur's, and to the eonvents and all manner of other places. And before all that I was a long time ill. I could not walk without a stick, and each step I took made me ery out, so dreadfully did my oot hurt me."

"So it was of some injury to the foot that the Blessed Virgin

ured you?"

Sophie did not have time to reply, for Sister Hyaeinthe, who was listening, intervened: "Of earies of the bones of the left heel, which had been going on for three years," said she. "The foot was swollen and quite deformed, and there were fistulas giving.

gress to continual suppuration."

On hearing this, all the sufferers in the carriage became intensely interested. They no longer took their eyes off this little girl on whom a miracle had been performed, but scanned her from head to foot as though sceking for some sign of the prodigy. Those who were able to stand rose up in order that they might the better see her, and the others, the infirm ones stretched on their mattresses, strove to raise themselves and turn their heads. Amidst the suffering which had again eome upon them on leaving Poitiers, the terror which filled them at the thought that they must continue rolling onward for another fifteen hours, the sudden advent of this child, favoured by Heaven, was like a divine relief, a ray of hope whence they would derive sufficient strength to accomplish the remainder of their terrible journey. The moaning had abated somewhat already, and every face was turned towards the girl with an ardent desire to believe.

This was especially the case with Marie, who, already reviving, joined her trembling hands, and in a gentle supplicating voice said to Pierre. "Question her, pray question her, ask her to tell us everything-eured, O God! eured of such a terrible complaint!"

Madame de Jonquière, who was quite affected, had leant over the partition to kiss the girl. "Certainly," said she, "our little friend will tell you all about it. Won't you, my darling? You will tell us what the Blessed Virgin did for you?"

"Oh, eertainly! madame—as much as you like," answered Sophie with her smiling, modest air, her eyes gleaming with intelligence. Indeed, she wished to begin at once, and raised her right hand with a pretty gesture, as a sign to everybody to be attentive.

Plainly enough, she had already acquired the habit of speaking in public

She could not be seen, however, from some parts of the carriage, and an idea came to Sister Hyacinthe, who said: "Get up on the seat, Sophie, and speak loudly, on account of the noise which the train makes."

This amused the girl, and before beginning she needed time to become serious again. "Well, it was like this," said she; "my foot was past cure, I couldn't even go to church any more, and it had to be kept bandaged, because there was always a lot of nasty matter coming from it. Monsieur Rivoire, the doctor, who had made a cut in it, so as to see inside it, said that he should be obliged to take out a piece of the bone; and that, sure enough, would have made me lame for life. But when I had got to Lourdes and had prayed a great deal to the Blessed Virgin, I went to dip my foot in the water, wishing so much that I might be cured that I did not even take the time to pull the bandage off. And everything remained in the water, there was no longer anything the matter with my foot when I took it out."

A murmur of mingled surprise, wonder, and desire arose and spread among those who heard this marvellous tale, so sweet and soothing to all who were in despair. But the little one had not yet finished. She had simply paused. And now, making a fresh gesture, holding her arms somewhat apart, she concluded: "When I got back to Vivonne and Monsieur Rivoire saw my foot again, he said: 'Whether it be God or the Devil who has cured this child, it is all the same to me; but in all truth she is cured'."

This time a burst of laughter rang out. The girl spoke in too recitative a way, having repeated her story so many times already that she knew it by heart. The doctor's remark was sure to produce an effect, and she herself laughed at it in advance, certain as she was that the others would laugh also. However, she still retained her candid, touching air.

But she had evidently forgotten some particular, for Sister Hyacinthe, a glanee from whom had foreshadowed the doctor's jest, now softly prompted her: "And what was it you said to Madame la Comtesse, the superintendent of your ward, Sophie?"

"Ah! yes. I hadn't brought many bandages for my foot with me, and I said to her, 'It was very kind of the Blessed Virgin to cure me the first day, as I should have run out of linen on the morrow."

This provoked a fresh outburst of delight. They all thought her so nice, to have been cured like that! And in reply to a question from Madame de Jonquière, she also had to tell the story of her boots, a pair of beautiful new boots which Madame la Comtesse had given her, and in which she had run, jumped, and danced about, full of childish delight. Boots! think of it, she who for three years had not even been able to wear a slipper.

Pierre, who had become grave, waxing pale with the secret uneasiness which was penetrating him, continued to look at her. And he also asked her other questions. She was certainly not lying, and he merely suspected a slow distortion of the actual truth, an easily explained embellishment of the real facts amidst all the joy she felt at being cured and becoming an important little personage. Who now knew if the cicatrisation of her injuries, effected, so it was asserted, completely, instantancously, in a few seconds, had not in reality been the work of days? Where were the witnesses?

Just then Madame de Jonquière began to relate that she had been at the hospital at the time referred to. "Sophie was not in my ward," said she, "but I had met her walking lame that very morning___'

Pierre hastily interrupted the lady-hospitaller. "Ah! you saw her foot before and after the immersion?"

"No. no! I don't think that anybody was able to see it, for it was bound round with bandages. She told you that the bandages had fallen into, the piscina." And, turning towards the child, Madame de Jonquière added, "But she will show you her foot—won't you Sophie? Undo your shoe."

The girl took off her shoe, and pulled down her stocking, with a promptness and ease of manner which showed how thoroughly accustomed she had become to it all. And she not only stretched out her foot, which was very clean and very white, carefully tended indeed, with well-cut, pink nails, but complacently turned it so that the young priest might examine it at his ease. Just below the ankle there was a long scar, whose whity seam, plainly defined, testified to the gravity of the complaint from which the girl had suffered.

"Oh! take hold of the heel, Monsieur l'Abbé," said she.

it as hard as you like. I no longer feel any pain at all."

Pierre made a gesture from which it might have been thought that he was delighted with the power exercised by the Blessed Virgin. But he was still tortured by doubt. What unknown force had acted in this case? Or rather what faulty medical diagnosis, what assemblage of errors and exaggerations, had ended in this fine tale?

All the patients, however, wished to see the miraculous foot, that outward and visible sign of the divine cure which each of them was going in search of. And it was Marie, sitting up in her box, and already feeling less pain, who touched it first. Then Madame Maze, quite roused from her melancholy, passed it on to Madamc Vincent, who would have kissed it for the hope which it restored to her. M. Sabathier had listened to all the explanations with a beatific air; Madame Vêtu, La Grivotte, and even But I for and dieir eyes and evinced signs of interest:

whilst the face of Elise Rougnet had assumed an extraordinary expression, transfigured by faith, almost beatified. If a sore had thus disappeared, might not her own sore close and disappear, her face retaining no trace of it save a slight sear, and again becoming such a face as other people had? Sophie, who was still standing, had to hold on to one of the iron rails, and place her foot on the partition, now on the right, now on the left. And she did not weary of it all, but felt exceedingly happy and proud at the many exchamations which were raised, the quivering admiration and religious respect which were bestowed on the little piece of her person, that little foot which had now, so to say, become sacred.
"One must possess great faith, no doubt," said Marie, thinking

"One must have a pure, unspotted soul." And, addressing herself to M. de Guersaint, she added: "Father, I feel that I should get well if I were ten years old, if I had the unspotted soul of a little girl."

"But you are ten years old, my darling! Is it not so, Pierre? A little girl of ten years old could not have a more spotless soul."

Possessed of a mind prone to chimeras, M. de Guersaint was fond of hearing tales of miracles. As for the young priest, profoundly affected by the ardent purity which the young girl evinced, he no longer sought to discuss the question, but let her surrender herself to the consoling illusions which Sophie's tale had wafted through the carriage.

The temperature had become yet more oppressive since their departure from Poitiers, a storm was rising in the coppery sky, and it seemed as though the train were rushing through a furnace. The villages passed, mournful and solitary under the burning sun. At Couhé-Verae they had again said their chaplets, and sung another canticle. At present, however, there was some slight abatement of the religious exercises. Sister Hyacinthe, who had not yet been able to lunch, ventured to cat a roll and some fruit in all haste, whilst still ministering to the strange man whose faint, painful breathing seemed to have become more regular. And it was only on passing Ruffee at three o'clock that they said the vespers of the Blessed Virgin.

"Ora pro nobis, sancta Dei Genitrix,"

"Ut digni efficiamur promissionibus Christi."

As they were finishing, M. Sabathier, who had watched little Sophie while she put on her shoe and stocking, turned towards M.

de Guersaint.
"This child's case is interesting, no doubt," he remarked. "But it, is a mere nothing, monsieur, for there have been far more marvellous cures than that. Do you know the story of Pierre de Rudder, a Belgian workingman?"

t "Pray for us, O holy mother of God." "That we may be made worthy of the promises of Christ."

Everybody had again begun to listen.

"This man," continued M. Sabathier, "had his leg broken by the fall of a tree. Eight years afterwards the two fragments of the bone had not yet joined together again-the two ends could be seen in the depths of a sore which was continually suppurating: and the leg hung down quite limp, swaying in all directions. Well. it was sufficient for this man to drink a glassful of the miraculous water, and his leg was made whole again. He was able to walk without crutches, and the doctor said to him: Your leg is like that of a new-born child.' Yes, indeed, a perfectly new leg!"

Nobody spoke, but the listeners exchanged glances of ecstasy. "And by the way," resumed M. Sabathier, "it is like the story of Louis Bouriette, a quarryman, one of the first of the Lourdes miracles. Do you know it? Bouriette had been injured by an explosion during some blasting operations. The sight of his right eye was altogether destroyed, and he was even threatened with the loss of the left one. Well, one day he sent his daughter to fetch a bottleful of the muddy water of the source, which then scarcely bubbled up to the surface. He washed his eye with this muddy liquid, and prayed fervently. And, all at once, he raised a cry, for he could see, monsieur, as well as you and I. The doctor who was attending him drew up a detailed narrative of the case, and there cannot be the slightest doubt about its truth."

"It is marvellous," murmured M. de Guersaint in his delight.

"Would you like another example, monsieur? I can give you a famous one, that of François Macary, the carpenter of Lavaur. During eighteen years he had suffered from a deep varicose ulcer. with considerable enlargement of the tissues in the mesial part of the left leg. He had reached such a point that he could no longer move, and science decreed that he would for ever remain infirm. Well, one evening, he shuts himself up with a bottle of Lourdes water. He takes off his bandages, washes both his legs. and drinks what little water then remains in the bottle. Then he goes to bed and falls asleep; and when he awakes, he feels his legs and looks at them. There is nothing left; the varicose enlargement, the ulcers, have all disappeared. The skin of his knee. monsieur, had become as smooth, as fresh as it had been when he was twenty."

This time there was an explosion of surprise and admiration. The patients and the pilgrims were entering into the enchanted land of miracles, where impossibilities are accomplished at each bend of the pathways, where one marches on at ease from prodicy to prodigy. And each had his or her story to tell, burning with a desire to contribute a fresh proof, to fortify faith and hope by yet another example.

That silent creature, Madame Maze, was so transported that she cocke the first "I have a friend," said she, "who knew the widow Rizan, that lady whose cure also ereated so great a stir. For four-and-twenty years her left side had been entirely paralysed. Her stomach was unable to retain any solid food, and she had become an inert bag of bones which had to be turned over in bed. The friction of the sheets, too, had ended by rubbing her skin away in parts. Well, she was so low one evening that the doctor announced that she would die during the night. An hour later, however, she emerged from her torpor and asked her daughter in a faint voice to go and fetch her a glass of Lourdes water at a neighbour's. But she was only able to obtain this glass of water on the following morning; and she eried out to her daughter: "Oh! it is life that I am drinking—rub my face with it, rub my arm and my leg, rub my whole body with it!" And when her daughter obeyed her, she gradually saw the huge swelling subside, and the paralysed, tumefied limbs recover their natural suppleness and appearance. Nor was that all, for Madame Rizan cried out that she was cured and felt hungry, and wanted bread and meat—she who had eaten none for four-and-twenty years! And she got out of bed and dressed herself, whilst her daughter, who was so overpowered that the neighbours thought she had become an orphan, replied to them: "No, no, mamma isn't dead, she has eome to life again!"

This narrative had brought tears to Madame Vincent's eyes. Ah! if she had only been able to see her little Rose recover like that, cat with a good appetite and run about again! At the same time, another ease, which she had been told of in Paris and which had greatly influenced her in deciding to take her ailing child to Lourdes, returned to her memory.

"And I too," said she, "know the story of a girl who was paralysed. Her name was Lueic Druon, and she was an inmate of an orphan asylum. She was quite young and could not even kneel down. Her limbs were bent like hoops. Her right leg, the shorter of the two, had ended by becoming twisted round the left one; and when any of the other girls earried her about you saw her feet hanging down quite limp, like dead ones. Please notice that she did not even go to Lourdes. She simply performed a novena; but she fasted during the nine days, and her desire to be cured was so great that she spent her nights in prayer. At last, on the ninth day, whilst she was drinking a little Lourdes water, she felt a violent commotion in her legs. She pieked herself up, fell down, pieked herself up again and walked. All her little companions, who were astonished, almost frightened at the sight, began to ery out: 'Lucie can walk! Lucie can walk!' was quite true. In a few seconds her legs had become straight and strong and healthy. She crossed the courtyard and was able to climb up the steps of the chapel, where the whole sisterhood, transported with gratitude, chanted the Magnificat. Ahl the dear child, how happy, how happy she must have been!"

As Madame Vincent finished, two tears fell from her cheeks on to the pale face of her little girl, whom she kissed distractedly.

The general interest was still increasing, becoming quite impassioned. The rapturous joy born of these beautiful stories, in which Heaven invariably triumplied over human reality, transported these child-like souls to such a point that those who were suffering the most grievously sat up in their turn, and recovered the power of speech. And with the narratives of one and all was blended a thought of the sufferer's own particular ailment, a belief that he or she would also be cured, since a malady of the same description had vanished like an evil dream beneath the breath of the Divinity.

"Ahl" stammered Madame Vêtu, her articulation hindered by her sufferings, "there was another one, Antoinette Thardivail, whose stomach was being eaten away like mine. You would have said that dogs were devouring it, and sometimes there was a swelling in it as big as a child's head. Tumours indeed were ever forming in it, like fowl's eggs, so that for eight months she brought up blood. And she also was at the point of death, with nothing but her skin left on her bones, and dying of hunger, when she drank some water of Lourdes and had the pit of her stomach washed with it. Three minutes afterwards her doctor, who on the previous day had left her almost in the last throes, scarce breathing, found her up and sitting by the fireside, eating a tender chicken's wing with a good appetite. She had no more tumours, she laughed as she had laughed when she was twenty, and her face had regained the brilliancy of youth. Ah! to be able to eat what one likes, to become young again, to cease suffering!"

"And the cure of Sister Juliennel" then exclaimed La Grivotte,

raising herself on one of her elbows, her eyes glittering with fever. "In her case it commenced with a bad cold as it did with mc, and then she began to spit blood. And every six months she fell ill again and had to take to her bed. The last time everybody said she wouldn't leave it alive. The doctors had vainly tried every remedy, iodine, blistering, and cauterising. In fact, hers was a real case of phthisis, certified by half-a-dozen medical men. Well, she comes to Lourdes, and Heaven alone knows amidst what awful suffering-she was so bad, indeed, that at Toulouse they thought for a moment that she was about to diel Sisters had to carry her in their arms, and on reaching the piscina the lady-hospitallers wouldn't bathe her. She was dead, they · said. No matter! she was undressed at last, and plunged into the water, quite unconscious and covered with perspiration. when they took her out she was so pale that they laid her on the ground, thinking that it was certainly all over with her at last. But, all at once, colour came back to her cheeks, her eyes opened, and she drew a long breath. She was cured; she dressed herself without any help and made a good meal after she had been to the Grotto to thank the Blessed Virgin. Therel there's no gainsaying it, that was a real case of phthisis, completely cured as though by medicinel"

Thereupon Brother Isidore in his turn wished to speak; but he mas unable to do so at any length, and could only with difficulty manage to say to his sister: "Marthe, tell them the story of Sister Dorothée which the priest of Saint-Sauveur related to us."

"Sister Dorothée," began the peasant girl in an awkward way, "felt her leg quite numbed when she got up one morning, and from that time she lost the use of it, for it got as cold as heavy as a stone. Besides which she felt a great pain in the back. doctors couldn't understand it. She saw half-a-dozen of them who pricked her with pins and burnt her skin with a lot of drugs. But it was just as if they had sung to her. Sister Dorothée had well understood that only the Blessed Virgin could find the right remedy for her, and so she went off to Lourdes, and had herself dipped in the piseina. She thought at first that the water was going to kill her, for it was so bitterly cold. But by-and-by it became so soft that she fancied it was warm, as nice as milk. She had never felt so nice before, it seemed to her as if her veins were opening and the water were flowing into them. As you will understand, life was returning into her body since the Blessed Virgin was concerning herself in the case. She no longer had anything the matter with her when she came out, but walked about, ate the whole of a pigeon for her dinner, and slept all night long like the happy woman she was. Glory to the Blessed Virgin, eternal gratitude to the most Powerful Mother and her Divine Son!"

Elise Rouquet would also have liked to bring forward a miraele Elise Rouquet would also have heed to bring forward a miracle which she was acquainted with. Only she spoke with so much difficulty owing to the deformity of her mouth, that she had not yet been able to secure a turn. Just then, however, there was a pause, and drawing the wrap, which concealed the horror of her sore, slightly on one side, she profited by the opportunity to begin. "For my part, I wasn't told anything about a great illness, but it was a very funny case at all events," she said. "It was about a woman, Célestine Dubois, as she was called, who had run a needle right into her hand while she was washing. It storped needle right into her hand while she was washing. It stopped there for seven years, for no doctor was able to take it out. Her hand shrivelled up, and she could no longer open it. Well, she got to Lourdes, and dipped her hand in the piseina. But as soon as she did so she began to shrick, and took it out again. Then they eaught hold of her and put her hand into the water by force, and kept it there while she continued sobbing, with her face covered with sweat. Three times did they plunge her hand into the piseina, and each time they saw the needle moving along, till it came out by the tip of the thumb. She shricked, of course, because the needle was moving through her flesh just as though somebody had been pushing it to drive it out. And after that Célestine never suffered again, and only a little scar could be seen on her hand as a mark of what the Blessed Virgin had done.

This ancodote produced a greater effect than even the miraculous cures of the most fearful illnesses. A needle which moved as though somebody were pushing it! This peopled the Invisible, showed each sufferer his Guardian Angel standing behind him. only awaiting the orders of Heaven in order to render him assistance. And besides, how pretty and childlike the story was-this needle which came out in the miraculous water after obstinately refusing to stir during seven long years. Exclamations of delight resounded from all the pleased listeners; they smiled and laughed with satisfaction, radiant at finding that nothing was beyond the power of Heaven, and that if it were Heaven's pleasure they themselves would all become healthy, young, and superb. It was sufficient that one should fervently believe and pray in order that Nature might be confounded and that the Incredible might come to pass. Apart from that, there was merely a question of good luck, since Heaven seemed to make a selection of those sufferers who should be cured.

"Ohl how beautiful it is, father," murmured Marie, who, revived by the passionate interest which she took in the momentous subject, had so far contented herself with listening, dumb with amazement as it were. "Do you remember," she continued, "what you yourself told me of that poor woman, Joachine Dehaut, who came from Belgium and made her way right across France with her twisted leg eaten away by an ulcer, the awful smell of which drove everybody away from her? First of all the ulcer was healed: you could press her knee and she felt nothing, only a slight redness remained to mark where it had been. And then came the turn of the dislocation. She shrieked while she was in the water, it seemed to her as if somebody were breaking her bones, pulling her leg away from her; and, at the same time, she and the woman who was bathing her saw her deformed foot rise and extend into its natural shape with the regular movement of a clock hand. Her leg also straightened itself, the muscles extended, the knee replaced itself in its proper position, all amidst such acute pain that Joachine ended by fainting. But as soon as she recovered consciousness, she darted off, erect and agile, to carry her crutches to the Grotto."

M. dc Guersaint in his turn was laughing with wonderment, waving his hand to confirm this story, which had been told him by a Father of the Assumption. He could have related a score of similar instances, said he, each more touching, more extraordinary than the other. He even invoked Pierre's testimony, and the young priest, who was unable to believe, contented himself with nodding his has been as to afflict

Marie, he had striven to divert his thoughts by gazing through the carriage window at the fields, trees, and houses which defiled before his eyes. They had just passed Angoulême, and meadows stretched out, and lines of poplar trees fled away amidst the continuous fanning of the air, which the velocity of the train occasinned.

They were late, no doubt, for they were hastening onward at full speed, thundering along under the stormy sky, through the fiery atmosphere, devouring kilomètre after kilomètre in swift However, despite himself, Pierre heard snatches of the various narratives, and grew interested in these extravagant stories, which the rough jolting of the wheels accompanied like a lullaby, as though the engine had been turned loose and were wildly bearing them away to the divine land of dreams. They were rolling, still rolling along, and Pierre at last ceased to gaze at the landscape, and surrendered himself to the heavy, sleepinviting atmosphere of the carriage, where ecstasy was growing and spreading, carrying every one far from that world of reality across which they were so rapidly rushing. The sight of Marie's face with its brightened look filled the young priest with sincere joy, and he let her retain his hand, which she had taken in order to acquaint him, by the pressure of her fingers, with all the confidence which was reviving in her soul. And why should he have saddened her by his doubts, since he was so desirous of her cure? So he continued clasping her small, moist hand, feeling infinite affection for her, a dolorous brotherly love which distracted him. and made him anxious to believe in the pity of the spheres, in a superior kindness which tempered suffering to those who were plunged in despair.

"Oh!" she repeated, "how beautiful it is, Pierre! How beautiful it is! And what glory it will be if the Blessed Virgin deigns to disturb herself for me! Do you really think me worthy of such a favour?"

'Assuredly I do," he exclaimed; "you are the best and the purest, with a spotless soul as your father said; there are not enough good angels in Paradise to form your escort."

But the narratives were not yet finished. Sister Hyaeinthe and Madame de Jonquière were now enumerating all the miracles with which they were acquainted, the long, long series of miraeles which for more than thirty years had been flowering at Lourdes, like the uninterrupted budding of the roses on the Mystical Rose-tree. They could be counted by thousands, they put forth fresh shoots every year with prodigious verdancy of sap, becoming brighter and brighter each successive season. And the sufferers who listened to these marvellous stories with increasing feverishness were like little ehildren who, after hearing one fine fairy tale, ask for another and another, and yet another. Ohl that they might have more and more of those stories in which evil reality was

flouted, in which unjust nature was cuffed and slapped, in which the Divinity intervened as the supreme healer, He who laughs at science and distributes happiness according to His own good pleasure.

First of all there were the deaf and the dumb who suddenly heard and spoke; such as Aurélie Bruneau, who was incurably dcaf, with the drums of both ears broken, and yet was suddenly enraptured by the celestial music of a harmonium; such also as Louise Pourchet, who on her side had been dumb for five-andtwenty years, and yet, whilst praying in the Grotto, suddenly exclaimed "Hail Mary, full of gracel" And there were others and yet others who were completely cured by merely letting a few drops of water fall into their ears or upon their tongues. Then came the procession of the blind: Father Hermann, who felt the Blessed Virgin's gentle hand removing the veil which covered his eyes; Mademoiselle de Pontbriant, who was threatened with a total loss of sight, but after a simple prayer was cnabled to see better than she had ever seen before; then a child of twelve years old whose corneas resembled marbles, but who, in three seconds, became possessed of clear, deep eyes, bright with an angelie smile. However there was especially an abundance of paralytics, of lame people suddenly enabled to walk upright, of sufferers for long years powerless to stir from their beds of misery and to whom the voice said: "Arise and walk!" Delaunoy, afflicted with ataxia, vainly cauterised and burnt, fifteen times an inmate of the Paris hospitals, whence he had emerged with the concurring diagnoses of twelve doctors, feels a strange force raising him up as the Blessed Sacrament goes by, and he begins to follow it, his legs strong and healthy once more. Marie Louise Delpon, a girl of fourteen, suffering from paralysis which had stiffened her legs, drawn back her hands, and twisted her mouth on one side, sees her limbs loosen and the distortion of her mouth disappear as though an invisible hand were severing the fearful bonds which had deformed her. Marie Vachier, riveted to her armchair during seventeen years by paraplegia, not only runs and flies on emerging from the piscina, but finds no trace even of the sores with which her long enforced immobility had covered her body. And Georges Hanquet, attacked by softening of the spinal marrow, passes without transition from agony to perfect health; while Leonie Charton, likewise afflicted with softening of the medulla, and whose vertebræ bulge out to a considerable extent, feels her hump melting away as though by enchantment, and her legs rise and straighten, renovated and vigorous.

&lt;sup>1</sup>This was one of the most curious of all the recorded cases, and I gave a few particulars concerning it in the earlier editions of this translation. Subsequently, however, the affair had a very strange sequel, an intelligent account of which cannot well be supplied within the compass of a foot-note. I have therefore inserted the needful details at the end of this volume.—Trans.

Maric, he had striven to divert his thoughts by gazing through the carriage window at the fields, trees, and houses which defiled before his eyes. They had just passed Angoulême, and meadows stretched out, and lines of poplar trees fled away amidst the continuous fanning of the air, which the velocity of the train occasioned.

They were late, no doubt, for they were hastening onward at full speed, thundering along under the stormy sky, through the fiery atmosphere, devouring kilomètre after kilomètre in swift However, despite himself, Pierre heard snatches of the various narratives, and grew interested in these extravagant stories, which the rough jolting of the wheels accompanied like a lullaby, as though the engine had been turned loose and were wildly bearing them away to the divine land of dreams. They were rolling, still rolling along, and Pierre at last ceased to gaze at the landscape, and surrendered himself to the heavy, sleepinviting atmosphere of the carriage, where cestasy was growing and spreading, carrying every one far from that world of reality across which they were so rapidly rushing. The sight of Marie's face with its brightened look filled the young priest with sincere joy, and he let her retain his hand, which she had taken in order to acquaint him, by the pressure of her fingers, with all the confidence which was reviving in her soul. And why should he have saddened her by his doubts, since he was so desirous of her cure? So he continued clasping her small, moist hand, feeling infinite affection for her, a dolorous brotherly love which distracted him, and made him anxious to believe in the pity of the spheres, in a superior kindness which tempered suffering to those who were plunged in despair.

"Ohl" she repeated, "how beautiful it is, Pierrel How beautiful it is! And what glory it will be if the Blessed Virgin deigns to disturb herself for me! Do you really think me worthy of such a favour?"

"Assuredly I do," he exclaimed; "you are the best and the purest, with a spotless soul as your father said; there are not enough good

angels in Paradise to form your escort."

But the narratives were not yet finished. Sister Hyaeinthe and Madame de Jonquière were now enumerating all the miraeles with which they were acquainted, the long, long series of miraeles which for more than thirty years had been flowering at Lourdes, like the uninterrupted budding of the roses on the Mystieal Rose-tree. They could be counted by thousands, they put forth fresh shoots every year with prodigious verdancy of sap, becoming brighter and brighter each successive season. And the sufferers who listened to these marvellous stories with increasing feverishness were like little children who, after hearing one fine fairy tale, ask for another and another, and yet another. Ohl that they might have more and more of those stories in which evil reality was flouted, in which unjust nature was cuffed and slapped, in which the Divinity intervened as the supreme healer, He who laughs at science and distributes happiness according to His own good

pleasure.

First of all there were the deaf and the dumb who suddenly heard and spoke; such as Aurélie Bruneau, who was incurably deaf, with the drums of both ears broken, and yet was suddenly enraptured by the eelestial music of a harmonium; such also as Louise Pourehet, who on her side had been dumb for five-andtwenty years, and yet, whilst praying in the Grotto, suddenly exclaimed "Hail Mary, full of grace!" And there were others and yet others who were completely cured by merely letting a few drops of water fall into their ears or upon their tongues. Then came the procession of the blind: Father Hermann, who felt the Blessed Virgin's gentle hand removing the veil which covered his eyes; Mademoiselle de Pontbriant, who was threatened with a total loss of sight, but after a simple prayer was enabled to see better than she had ever seen before; then a child of twelve years old whose corneas resembled marbles, but who, in three seconds, became possessed of elear, deep eyes, bright with an angelic smile. However there was especially an abundance of paralytics, of lame people suddenly enabled to walk upright, of sufferers for long years powerless to stir from their beds of misery and to whom the voice said: "Arise and walk!" Delaunoy, afflicted with ataxia, vainly cauterised and burnt, fifteen times an inmate of the Paris hospitals, whence he had emerged with the concurring diagnoses of twelve doctors, feels a strange force raising him up as the Blessed Sacrament goes by, and he begins to follow it, his legs strong and healthy once more. Marie Louise Delpon, a girl of fourteen, suffering from paralysis which had stiffened her legs, drawn back her hands, and twisted her mouth on one side, sees her limbs loosen and the distortion of her mouth disappear as though an invisible hand were severing the fearful bonds which had deformed her. Marie Vachier, riveted to her armchair during seventeen years by paraplegia, not only runs and flies on emerging from the piscina, but finds no trace even of the sores with which her long enforced immobility had covered her body. And Georges Hanquet, attacked by softening of the spinal marrow, passes without transition from agony to perfeet health; while Léonie Charton, likewise afflicted with softening of the medulla, and whose vertebræ bulge out to a considerable extent, feels her hump melting away as though by enchantment, and her legs rise and straighten, renovated and vigorous.

&lt;sup>1</sup>This was one of the most curious of all the recorded cases, and I gave a few particulars concerning it in the earlier editions of this translation. Subsequently, however, the affair had a very strange sequel, an intelligent account of which cannot well be supplied within the compass of a foot-note. I have therefore inserted the

Then came all sorts of ailments. First those brought about by scrofula—a great many more legs long incapable of service and made anew. There was Margaret Gehier, who had suffered from eoxalgia for seven-and-twenty years, whose lup was devoured by the disease, whose left knee was anchylosed, and who yet was suddenly able to fall upon her knees to thank the Blessed Virgin for healing her. There was also Philomène Simonneau, the young Vendéenne, whose left leg was perforated by three horrible sores in the depths of which her carious bones were visible, and whose bones, whose flesh, and whose skin were all formed afresh.

Next came the dropsical ones: Madame Ancelin, the swelling of whose feet, hands, and entire body subsided without anyone being able to tell whither all the water had gone; Mademoiselle Montagnon, from whom, on various occasions, nearly twenty quarts of water had been drawn, and who, on again swelling, was entirely rid of the fluid by the application of a bandage which had been dipped in the miraculous source. And, in her case also, none of the water could be found, either in her bed or on the floor. In the same way not a complaint of the stomach resisted, all disappeared with the first glass of water. There was Marie Souchet, who yomited black blood, who had wasted to a skeleton, and who devoured her food and recovered her flesh in two days' timel There was Marie Jarland, who had burnt herself internally through drinking a glassful of a metallic solution used for cleansing and brightening kitchen utensils, and who felt the tumour which had resulted from her injuries melt rapidly away. Moreover, every tumour disappeared in this fashion, in the piseina, without leaving the slightest trace behind. But that which caused yet greater wonderment was the manner in which uleers, caneers, all sorts of horrible, visible sores were cleatrised by a breath from on high, A Jew, an actor, whose hand was devoured by an ulcer, merely had to dip it in the water and he was cured. A very wealthy young foreigner who had a wen as large as a hen's egg on his right wrist, beheld it dissolve. Rose Duval, who, as a result of a white tumour had a hole in her left elbow, large enough to accommodate a wal-nut, was able to watch and follow the prompt action of the new flesh in filling up this eavity! The widow Fromond, with a lip half destroyed by a cancerous formation, merely had to apply the miraculous water to it as a lotion, and not even a red mark remained. Marie Moreau, who experienced fearful sufferings from a cancer in the breast, fell asleep, after laying on it a linen eloth soaked in some water of Lourdes, and when she awoke, two hours later, the pain had disappeared, and her flesh was once more smooth and pink and fresh.

At last Sister Hyacinthe began to speak of the immediate and complete cures of phthisis, and this was the triumph, the healing of that terrible disease which ravages humanity, which unbelievers defied the Blessed Virgin to cure, but which she did cure, it was said, by merely raising her little finger.\ A hundred instances, more extraordinary one than the other, pressed forward for citation.

Marguerite Coupel, who has suffered from phthisis for three years, and the upper part of whose lungs is destroyed by tuberculosis, riscs up and goes off, radiant with health. Madame do la Rivière, who spits blood, who is ever covered with a cold perspiration, whose nails have already acquired a violet tinge, who is indeed on the point of drawing her last breath, requires but a spoonful of the water to be administered to her between her teeth, and lo! the rattle ceases, she sits up, makes the responses to the litanies, and asks for some broth. Julic Jadot requires four spoonfuls; but then she could no longer hold up her head, she was of such a delicate constitution that disease had reduced her to nothing; and yet, in a few days, she becomes quite fat. Anna Catry, who is in the most advanced stage of the malady, with her left lung half destroyed by a cavity, is plunged five times into the cold water, contrary to all the dictates of prudence, and she is cured, her lung is healthy once more. Another consumptive girl, condemned by fifteen doctors, has asked nothing, has simply fallen on her knees in the Grotto, by chance as it were, and is afterwards quite surprised at having been cured an passage, through the lucky circumstance of having been there, no doubt, at the hour when the Blessed Virgin, moved to pity, allows miracles to fall from her invisible hands.

Miracles and yet more miracles! They rained down like the flowers of dreams from a clear and balmy sky. Some of them were touching, some of them were childish. An old woman who, having her hand anchylosed, had been incapable of moving it for thirty years, washes it in the water and is at once able to make the sign of the Cross. Sister Sophie, who barked like a dog, plunges into the piscina and emerges from it with a clear, pure yoice, chanting a canticle. Mustapha, a Turk, invokes the White Lady and recovers the use of his right eye by applying a compress to it. An officer of Turcos was protected at Sedan; a entrassier of Reichsoffen would have died, pierced in the heart by a bullet, if this bullet after passing through his packet book had not stayed its flight on reaching a little picture of Our Lady of Lourdes! And, as with the men and the women, so did the children, the poor, suffering little ones, find mercy; a paralytic boy of five rose and walked, after being held for five minutes under the icy jet of the spring, another one, litteen years of age, who, lying in bed, could only raise an inarticulate cry, sprang out of the piscina, shouting that he was cured, another one, but two years old, a poor tiny fellow who had never been able to walk, remained for a quarter of an hour in the eold water and then, invigorated and smiling, took his first steps like a little man! And for all of them, the little ones as well as the adults, the pain was acute whilst the miracle was being accomplished; for the work of repair could not be effected without causing an extraordinary shock to the whole human organism; the bones grew again, new flesh was formed, and the disease, driven away, made its escape in a final convulsion. But how great was the feeling of comfort which followed! The doctors could not believe their eyes, their astonishment burst forth at each fresh cure, when they saw the patients whom they had despaired of run and jump and eat with ravenous appetites. All these chosen ones, these women eured of their ailments, walked a couple of miles, sat down to roast fowl, and slept the soundest of sleeps for a dozen hours. Moreover, there was no convalescence, it was a sudden leap from the death throes to complete health. Limbs were renovated, sores were filled up, organs were reformed in their entirety, plumpness returned to the emaciated, all with the velocity of a lightning flash! Science was completely baffled. Not even the most simple preeautions were taken, women were bathed at all times and seasons perspiring consumptives were plunged into the icy water, sores were left to their putrefaction without any thought of employing antisepties. And then what eantieles of joy, what shouts of gratitude and love arose at each fresh miracle! The favoured one falls upon her knees, all who are present weep, conversions are effected, Protestants and Jews alike embrace Catholicism-other miracles these, miracles of faith, at which Heaven triumphs. And when the favoured one, chosen for the miraele, returns to her village, all the inhabitants crowd to meet her, whilst the bells peal merrily; and when she is seen springing lightly from the vehicle which has brought her home, shouts and sobs of joy burst forth and all intonate the Mugnificat: Glory to the Blessed Virgini Gratitude and love for ever!

. It is commonly stated that there are more cases of consumption in England than in any other country in the world. This passage should therefore be of particular interest to English renders. Trans

Indeed, that which was more particularly evolved from the realisation of all these hopes, from the celebration of all'these ardent thanksgivings, was gratitude—gratitude to the Mother most pure and most admirable. She was the great passion of every soul, she, the Virgin most powerful, the Virgin most mereiful, the Mirror of Justice, the Seat of Wisdom.<sup>2</sup> All hands were stretched towards her, Mystical Rose in the dim light of the chapels, Tower of Ivory on the horizon of dreamland, Gate of Heaven leading into the Infinite. Each day at early dawn she shone forth, bright Morning Star, gay with juvenescent hope. And was she not also the Health of the weak, the Refuge of sinners, the Comforter of the afflicted? France had ever been her well-loved country, she was adored there with an ardent worship, the worship of her womanhood and her motherhood, the soaring of a divine affection; and it was particularly in France that it pleased her to show herself to little shepherdesses. She was so good to the little and the humble; she continually occupied herself with them; and if she was appealed to so willingly it was because she was known to be the intermediary of love betwixt Earth and Heaven. Every evening she wept tears of gold at the feet of her divine Son to obtain favours from Him, and these fayours were the miracles which He permitted her to work,-these beautiful, flower-like miracles, as sweet-scented as the roses of Paradise, so prodigiously splendid and fragrant.

&lt;sup>1</sup> For the information of Protestant readers it may be mentioned that all the titles enumerated in this passage are taken from the Litany of the Blessed Virgin.—Trans.

But the train was still rolling, rolling onward. They had just passed Coutras, it was six o'clock, and Sister Hyacinthe, rising to her feet, clapping her hands together and once again repeated:

"The Angelus, my children!"

Never had "Aves" impregnated with greater faith, inflamed with a more fervent desire to be heard by Heaven, winged their flight on high. And Pierre suddenly understood everything, clearly realised the meaning of all these pilgrimages, of all these trains rolling along through every country of the civilised world, of all these cager crowds, hastening towards Lourdes, which blazed over yonder like the abode of salvation for body and for mind. Ah! the poor wretches whom, ever since morning, he had heard groaning with pain, the poor wretches who exposed their sorry carcasses to the fatigues of such a journey! They were all condemned, abandoned by science, weary of consulting doctors, of having tried the torturing effects of futile remedies. And how well one could understand that, burning with a desire to preserve their lives, unable to resign themselves to the injustice and indifference of Nature, they should dream of a superhuman power, of an almighty Divinity who, in their favour, would perchance annul the established laws, alter the course of the planets, and reconsider His creation! For if the world failed them, did not the Divinity remain to them? In their cases reality was too abominable, and an immense need of illusion and falsehood sprang up within them. Oh! to believe that there is a supreme Justiciar somewhere, one who rights the apparent wrongs of things and beings; to believe that there is a Redeemer, a consoler who is the real master, who can carry the torrents back to their source, who can restore youth to the aged, and life to the dead! And when you are coveredwith sores, when your limbs are twisted, when your stomach is swollen by tumours, when your lungs are destroyed by disease, to be able to say that all this is of no consequence, that everything may disappear and be renewed at a sign from the Blessed Virgin, that it is sufficient that you should pray to her, touch her heart, and obtain the favour of being chosen by her. And then what a heavenly fount of hope appeared with the prodigious flow of those beautiful stories of cure, those adorable fairy tales which lulled and intoxicated the feverish imaginations of the sick and the infirm. Since little Sophie Couteau, with her white, sound foot, had elimbed into that carriage, opening to the gaze of those within it the limitless heavens of the Divine and the Supernatural, how well one could understand the breath of resurrection that was passing over the world, slowly raising those who despaired the most from their beds of misery, and making their eyes shine since life was yet a possibility for them, and they were, perhaps, about to begin it afresh.

Yes, 'twas indeed that. If that woeful train was rolling, rolling on, if that earriage was full, if the other carriages were full also, if France, and the world, from the uttermost limits of the earth, were crossed by similar trains, if crowds of three hundred thousand believers, bringing thousands of sick along with them, were ever setting out, from one end of the year to the other, it was because the Grotto yonder was shining forth in its glory like a beacon of hope and illusion, like a sign of the revolt and triumph of the Impossible over inexorable materiality. Never had a more impassionating romance been devised to exalt the souls of men above the stern laws of life. To dream that dream, this was the great, the inestable happiness. If the Fathers of the Assumption liad seen the success of their pilgrimages increased and spread from year to year, it was because they sold to all the flocking peoples the bread of consolation and illusion, the delicious bread of lope, for which suffering humanity ever hungers with a hunger that nothing will ever appease. And it was not merely the physical sores which eried aloud for cure, the whole of man's moral and intellectual being likewise shricked forth its wretchedness, with an insatiable yearning for happiness. To be happy, to place the certainty of life in faith, to lean till death should come upon that one strong staff of travel-such was the desire exhaled by every breast, the desire which made every moral grief bend the knee, imploring a continuance of grace, the conversion of dear ones, the spiritual salvation of self and those one loved. The mighty ery spread from pole to pole, ascended and filled all the regions of space: To be happy, happy for evermore, both in life and in deathl

And Pierre saw the suffering beings around him lose all perception of the jolting and recover their strength as league by league they drew nearer to the miracle. Even Madame Maze grew talkative, certain as she felt that the Blessed Virgin would restore her husband to her. With a smile on her face Madame Vincent gently rocked her little Rose in her arms, thinking that she was not nearly so ill as those all but lifeless children who, after being plunged in the icy water, sprang out and played. M. Sabathier jested with M. de Guersaint, and explained to him that, next October, when he had recovered the use of his legs, he should go on a trip to Rome—a journey which he had been postpouling for fifteen years and more. Madame Vêtu, quite calmed, feeling nothing but a slight twinge in the stomach, imagined that she was hungry, and asked Madame de Jonquière to let her dip some stripe of bread in a glass of milk; whilst Elise Rouquet, forgetting her sores, ate some grapes, with face uncovered. And in La Grivotte who was now sitting up and Brother Isidore who had ceased moaning, all those fine stories had left a pleasing fever, to such a point that, impatient to be cured, they grew anxious know the time. For a minute also the man, the strange man, respectituted. Whilst Sister Hyacinthe was again wiping the cold such from his brow, he raised his eyelids, and a smile momentarily brightened his pallid countenance. Yet once again he, also be: hoped.

BERNADETTE

The train left Bordeaux after a stoppage of a few minutes, during which those who had not dined hastened to purchase some provisions. Moreover, the ailing ones were constantly drinking milk, and asking for biscuits like little children. And, as soon as they were off again, Sister Hyacinthe elapped her hands and exclaimed. "Come, let us make liaste; the evening prayer."

Thereupon, during a quarter of an hour came a confused murnuring, made up of "Paters" and "Aves," self-examinations, acts of contrition, and vows of trustful reliance in God, the Blessed Virgin, and the Saints, with thanksgivings for protection and preservation that day, and, at last, a prayer for the living and for the faithful departed.

"In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

Amen."

It was ten minutes past eight o'clock, the shades of night were already bedimming the landscape—a vast plain which the evening mist seemed to prolong into the infinite, and where, far away, bright dots of light shone out from the windows of lonely, scattered houses. In the carriage, the lights of the lamps were flickering, casting a subdued yellow glow on the luggage and the pilgrims, who were sorely shaken by the spreading tendency of the train's motion.

"You know, my children," resumed Sister Hyacinthe, who had remained standing, "I shall order silence when we get to Lamothe, in about an hour's time. So you have an hour to amuse yourselves, but you must be reasonable and not excite yourselves too much. And when we have passed Lamothe, you hear me, there must not be another word, another sound, you must all go to sleep."

This made them laugh.

"Ohl but it is the rule, you know," added the Sister, "and surely you have too much sense not to obey me."

Since the morning they had punctually fulfilled the programme of religious exercises specified for each successive hour. And now that all the prayers had been said, the heads told, the hymns chanted, the day's duties were over, and a brief interval of recreation was allowed before sleeping. They were however at a loss as to what they should do.

"Sister," suddenly said Marie, "if you would allow Monsieur

"Sister," suddenly said Marie, "if you would allow Monsieur l'Abbé to read to us—he reads extremely well—and as it happens I have a little book with me—a history of Bernadette which is so interesting-"

The others did not let her finish, but with the suddenly awakened desire of children to whom a beautiful story has been promised, loudly exclaimed: "Ohl yes, Sister. Ohl yes, Sister."

"Of course I will allow it," replied Sister Hyacinthe, "since it is a question of reading something instructive and edifying."

Pierre was obliged to consent. But to be able to read the book he wished to be under the lamp, and it was necessary that he should change seats with M. de Guersaint, whom the promise of a story had delighted as much as it did the ailing ones. And when the young priest, after changing seats and declaring that he would be able to see well enough, at last opened the little book, a quiver of curiosity sped from one end of the carriage to the other, and every head was stretched out, lending ear with rapt attention. Fortunately, Pierre had a clear, powerful voice and made himself distinctly heard above the wheels, which now that the train travelled across a vast level plain, gave out but a subdued, rumbling sound.

Before beginning, however, the young priest had examined the book. It was one of those little works of propaganda issued from the Catholic printing-presses and circulated in profusion throughout all Christendom. Badly printed, on wretched paper, it was adorned on its bluc cover with a little woodcut of Our Lady of Lourdes, a naïve design alike stiff and awkward. The book itself was short, and half-an-hour would certainly suffice for Pierre to read it from cover to cover without hurrying.

Accordingly, in his fine, clear voice, with its penetrating musical tones, he began his perusal as follows:-

"It happened at Lourdes, a little town near the Pyrenees, on a Thursday, February 11, 1858. The weather was cold, and somewhat cloudy, and in the humble home of a poor but honest miller named François Soubirous there was no wood to cook the dinner. The miller's wife, Louise, said to her younger daughter, Marie, 'Go and gather some wood on the bank of the Gave or on the common-land.' The Gave is a torrent which passes through Lourdes.

"Marie had an elder sister, named Bernadette, who had lately arrived from the country, where some worthy villagers had employed her as a shepherdess. She was a slender, delieate, extremely innocent child, and knew nothing except her rosary. Louise Soubirous hesitated to send her out with her sister, on account of the cold, but at last, yielding to the entreaties of Marie and a young girl of the neighbourhood called Jeanne Abadie, she consented to let her go.

"Following the bank of the torrent and gathering stray fragments of dead wood, the three maidens at last found themselves in front of a grotto, hollowed out in a huge mass of rock which the people of the district called Massabielle."

Pierre had reached this point and was turning the page when he suddenly paused and let the little book fall on his knees. The childish character of the narrative, its ready-made, empty phraseology, filled him with impatience. He himself possessed quite a collection of documents concerning this extraordinary story, had passionately studied even its most trifling details, and in the depths of his heart retained a feeling of tender affection and infinite pity for Bernadette. He had just reflected, too, that on the very next day he would be able to begin that decisive inquiry which he had formerly dreamt of making at Lourdes. In fact, this was one of the reasons which had induced him to accompany Marie on her journey. And he was now conscious of an awakening of all his curiosity respecting the Visionary, whom he loved because he felt that she had been a girl of candid soul, truthful and ill-fated, though at the same time he would much have liked to analyse and explain her case. Assuredly, she had not lied, she had indeed beheld a vision and heard voices, like Joan of Are; and like Joan of Are also, she was now, in the opinion of the devout, accomplishing the deliverance of France-from sin if not from invaders. Pierre wondered what force could have produced her-her and her work. How was it that the visionary faculty had become developed in that lowly girl, so distracting believing souls as to bring about a renewal of the miraeles of primitive times, as to found almost a new religion in the midst of a Holy City, built at an outlay of millions, and ever invaded by crowds of worshippers more numerous and more exalted in mind than had ever been known of since the days of the Crusades?

And so, ceasing to read the book, Pierre began to tell his companions all that he knew, all that he had divined and reconstructed of that story which is yet so obscure despite the vast rivers of ink which it has already caused to flow. He knew the country and its manners and customs, through his long conversations with his friend, Doctor Chassaigne. And he was endowed with charming fluency of language, an emotional power of exquisite purity, many remarkable gifts well fitting him to be a pulpit orator, which he never made use of, although he had known them to be within him ever since his seminary days. When the occupants of the carriage perceived that he knew the story, far better and in far greater detail than it appeared in Marie's little book, and that he related it also in such a gentle yet passionate way, there came an increase of attention, and all those afflicted souls hungering for happiness went forth towards him

First came the story of Bernadette's childhood at Bartrès, where she had grown up in the abode of her foster-mother, Madame Lagûes, who, having lost an infant of her own, had rendered those poor folks, the Soubirous, the service of suckling and keeping their child for them. Bartrès, a village of four hundred souls, at a league or so from Lourdes, lay as it were in a desert oasis, sequestered amidst greenery, and far from any frequented highway. The road dips down, the few houses are scattered over grassland, divided by hedges and planted with walnut and chestnut trees, whilst the clear rivulets, which are never silent, follow the sloping banks beside the pathways, and nothing rises on high save the small ancient romanesque church, which is perched on a hillock, covered with graves. Wooded slopes undulate upon all sides. Bartrès lies in a hollow amidst grass of delicious freshness, grass of intense greenness, which is ever moist at the roots, thanks to the eternal subterraneous expanse of water that descends from the mountains. And Bernadette, who, since becoming a big girl, had paid for her keep by tending lambs, was wont to take them with her, season after season, through all the greenery where she never met a soul. It was only now and then, from the summit of some slope, that she saw the far-away mountains, the Pic du Midi, the Pic de Viscos, those masses which rose up, bright or gloomy, according to the weather, and which stretched away to other peaks, lightly and faintly coloured, vaguely and eonfusedly outlined, like apparitions seen in dreams.

Then came the home of the Lagûes, where her eradle was still preserved, a solitary, silent house, the last of the village. A meadow planted with pear and apple trees, and only separated from the open country by a narrow stream which one could jump across, stretched out in front of the house. Inside the latter, a low and damp abode, there were, on either side of the wooden stairway leading to the loft, but two spacious rooms, flagged with stones, and each containing four or five beds. The girls, who slept together, fell asleep at even, gazing at the fine pictures affixed to the walls, whilst the big clock in its pinewood case gravely struck the hours in the midst of the deep silence. Ahl Those years of Bartrés; in what sweet peacefulness did Bernadette live them! Yet she grew up very thin, always in bad health; suffering from a nervous asthma which stifled her at the least veering of the wind; and on attaining her twelfth year she could neither read nor write, nor speak otherwise than in dialect, having remained quite infantile, behindhand in mind as in body. She was a very good little girl, very gentle and well-behaved, and but little different to other children, except that instead of talking she preferred it to other children, except that instead of the often she preferred to listen. Limited as was her intelligence, she often evinced much natural common sense, and at times was prompt in her remetical actions and at times was prompt made one in her réparties, with a kind of simple gaiety which made one smile. It was a with a kind of simple gaiety which made one smile. It was only with infinite trouble that she was taught her rosary, and when she knew it she seemed bent on carrying her knowledge no fact when knowledge no further, but repeated it all day long, so that whenever you met harmer, but repeated it all day long, so haplet ever you met her with her lambs, she invariably between her fingers, diligently telling each spees "Ave." For long long hours she lived like the

of the hills, hidden away and hounted so mysteries of the foliage, seeing nought of the world save the crests of the distant mountains, which, for an instant, every now and then, would soar aloft in the radiant light, as ethereal as the peaks of dreamland.

Days followed days, and Bernadette roamed, dreaming her one narrow dream, repeating the sole prayer she knew, which gave her, amidst her solitude, so fresh and naïvely infantile, no other companion and friend than the Blessed Virgin. But what pleasant evenings she spent at winter-time in the room on the left, where a fire was kept burning! Her foster-mother had a brother, a priest, who occasionally read some marvellous stories, to them-stories of saints, prodigious adventures of a kind to make one tremble with mingled fear and joy, in which Paradise appeared upon earth, whilst the heavens opened and a glimpse was eaught of the splendour of the angels. The books he brought with him were often full of pictures-God the Father enthroned amidst His glory; Jesus, so gentle and so handsome with His beaming face; the blessed Virgin, who recurred again and again, radiant with splendour, clad now in white, now in azure, now in gold, and ever so amiable, that Bernadette would see her again in her dreams. But the book which was read more than all others was the Bible, an old Bible which had been in the family for more than a hundred years, and which time and usage had turned yel-Each winter evening Bernadette's foster-father, the only member of the household who had learnt to read, would take a pin, pass it at random between the leaves of the book, open the latter, and then start reading from the top of the right-hand page, amidst the deep attention of both the women and the children, who · ended by knowing the book by heart, and could have continued reciting it without making a single mistake.

However, Bernadette, for her part, preferred the religious works in which the Blessed Virgin constantly appeared with her engaging smile. True, one reading of a different character amused her, that of the marvellous story of the Four Brothers Aymon. On the yellow paper cover of the little book, which had doubtless fallen from the bale of some pedlar who had lost his way in that remote region, there was a naïve cut showing the four doughty knights, Renaud and his brothers, all mounted on Bayard, their famous battle charger, that princely present made to them by the fairy Orlanda. And inside were narratives of bloody fights, of the huilding and besieging of fortresses, of the terrible sword-thrusts exchanged by Roland and Renaud, who was at last about to free the Holy Land, without mentioning the tales of Maugis the Magician and his marvellous enchantments, and the Princess Clarisse, the King of Aquitaine's sister, who was more lovely than sunlight. Her imagination fired by such stories as these, Bernadette often found it difficult to get to sleep; and this was especially the case on the evenings when the books were left aside and some person of the company related a tale of witchcraft. The girl was very superstitious, and after sundown could never be prevailed upon to pass near a tower in the vicinity, which was said to be haunted by a fiend. For that matter, all the folks of the region were superstitious, devout, and simple-minded, the whole countryside being peopled, so to say, with mysteries-trees which sang, stones from which blood flowed, cross-roads where it was necessary to say three "Paters" and three "Aves," if you did not wish to meet the seven-horned beast who carried maidens off to perdition. And what a wealth of terrifying stories there was! Hundreds of stories, so that there was no finishing on the evenings when somebody started them. First came the werewolf adventures, the tales of the unhappy men whom the demon forced to enter into the bodies of dogs, the great white dogs of the mountains. If you fire a gun at the dog and a single shot should strike him, the man will be delivered; but if the shot should fall on the dog's shadow, the man will immediately die. Then came the endless procession of sorcerers and sorceresses. In one of these tales Bernadette evinced a passionate interest; it was the story of a clerk of the tribunal of Lourdes who, wishing to see the devil, was conducted by a witch into an untilled field at midnight on Good Friday. The devil arrived clad in magnificent scarlet garments, and at once proposed to the clerk that he should buy his soul, an offer which the clerk pretended to accept. It so happened that the devil was carrying under his arm a register in which different persons of the town, who had already sold themselves, had signed their names. However the clerk, who was a cunning fellow, pulled out of his pocket a pretended bottle of ink, which in reality contained holy water, and with this he sprinkled the devil, who raised frightful shrieks, whilst the clerk took to flight, carrying the register off with him. Then began a wild, mad race, which might last throughout the night, over the mountains, through the valleys, across the forests and the torrents. "Give me back my register!" shouted the fiend. "No, you shan't have it!" replied the clerk. And again and again it began afresh: "Givc me back my register!" "No, you shan't have it!" And at last, finding himself out of breath, near the point of succumbing, the clerk, who had his plan, threw himself into the cemetery, which was consecrated ground, and was there able to deride the devil at his ease, waving the register which he had purloined so as to save the souls of all the unhappy people who had signed their names in it. On the evening when this story was told, Bernadette, before surrendering herself to sleep, would mentally repeat her rosary, delighted with the thought that hell should have been baffled, though she trembled at the idea that it would surely return to prowl around her, as soon as the lamp should have been put out.

Throughout one winter, the long evenings were spent in the church. Abbé Ader, the village priest, had authorised it, and many families eame, in order to economise oil and candles. Moreover they felt less cold when gathered together in this fashion. The Bible was read, and prayers were repeated, whilst the children ended by falling asleep. Bernadette alone struggled on to the finish, so pleased she was at being there, in that narrow nave whose slender nerves were coloured blue and red. At the farther end was the altar, also painted and gilded, with its twisted columns and its screens on which appeared the Virgin and St. Anne, and the Beheading of St. John the Baptist-the whole of a gaudy and somewhat barbarie splendour. And as sleepiness grew upon her, the child must have often seen a mystical vision as it were of those erudely coloured designs rising before her-have seen the blood flowing from St. John's severed head, have seen the aureolas shining, the Virgin ever returning and gazing at her with her blue living eyes, and looking as though she were on the point of opening her vermilion lips in order to speak to her. For some months Bernadette spent her evenings in this wise, half asleep in front of that sumptuous, vaguely defined altar, in the incipiency of a divine dream which she carried away with her, and finished in bed, slumbering peacefully under the watchful care guardian angel.

And it was also in that old church, so humble yet so impregnated with ardent faith, that Bernadette began to learn her catechism. She would soon be fourteen now, and must think of her first communion. Her foster-mother, who had the reputation of being avaricious, did not send her to school, but employed her in or about the house from morning till evening. M. Barbet, the schoolmaster, never saw her at his classes, though one day, when he gave the catechism lesson, in the place of Abbé Ader who was indisposed, he remarked her on account of her piety and modesty. The village priest was very fond of Bernadette and often spoke of her to the schoolmaster, saying that he could never look at her without thinking of the children of La Salette, since they must have been good, candid, and pious as she was, for the Blessed Virgin to have appeared to them. On another occasion whilst the two men were walking one morning near the village, and saw Bernadette disappear with her little flock under some spreading trees in the distance, the Abbé repeatedly turned round to look for her, and again remarked: "I cannot account for it, but every time I meet that child it seems to me as if I saw Mélanie, the young shepherdess, little Maximin's companion." He was certainly beset by this singular idea, which became, so to say, a prediction. Moreover, had he not one day after catechism. or one evening when the villagers were gathered in the church, related that marvellous story which was already twelve years old, that story of the Lady in the dazzling robes who walked upon the grass without even making it bend, the Blessed Virgin who showed horself to Mélanie and Maximin on the banks of a stream in the mountains, and confided to them a great secret and announced the anger of her Son? Ever since that day a source had sprung up from the tears which she had shed, a source which cured all ailments, whilst the secret, inscribed on parchment fastened with three seals, slumbered at Romel And Bernadette, no doubt, with her dreamy, silent air, had listened passionately to that wonderful tale and carried it off with her into the desert of foliage where she spent her days, so that she might live it over again as she walked along behind her lambs with her rosary slipping bead by bead between her slender fingers.

<sup>1</sup>It was on September 19, 1846, that the Virgin is said to have appeared in the ravine of La Sezia, adjacent to the vally of La Salette, between Corps and Entraigues, in the department of the Isere. The visionaries were Melanie Mathieu, a girl of fourteen, and Maximin Giraud, a boy of twelve. The local clergy speedily endorsed the story of the Miraele, and thousands of people still go every year in pligrimage to a church overlooking the valley, and bathe and drink at a so-callea miraculous source. Two priests of Grenoble, however, Abbe Deleon and Abbe Cartellier, necused a Middle, de Lamerliere of having concocted the miraele, and when she took proceedings against them for libel she lost her case.—Trans.

Thus her childhood ran its course at Bartrès. That which delighted one in this Bernadette, so poor-blooded, so slight of build, was her costatic cyes, beautiful visionary eyes, from which dreams soared aloft like birds winging their flight in a pure limpid sky. Her mouth was large, with lips somewhat thick, expressive of kindliness; her square-shaped head had a straight brow, and was covered with thick black hair, whilst her face would have seemed rather common but for its charming expression of gentle obstinacy. Those who did not gaze into her eyes, however, gave her no thought. To them she was but an ordinary child, a poor thing of the roads, a girl of reluctant growth, timidly humble in her ways. Assuredly it was in her glance that Abbé Ader had with agitation detected the stifling ailment which filled her puny, girlish form with suffering-that ailment born of the greeny solitude in which she had grown up, the gentleness of her bleating lambs, the Angelic Salutation which she had carried with her, hither and thither, under the sky, repeating and repeating it to the point of hallucination, the prodigious stories too which she had heard folk tell at her foster-mother's, the long evenings spent before the living altarscreens in the church, and all the atmosphere of primitive faith which she had breathed in that far-away rural region, hemmed in by mountains.

At last, on one seventh of January, Bernadette had just reached her fourteenth birthday, when her parents, finding that she learnt nothing at Bartrès, resolved to bring her back to Lourdes for good, in order that she might diligently study her catechism, and in this wise seriously prepare herself for her first communion. And so it happened that she had already been at Lourdes some fifteen or twenty days, when on February 11, a Thursday, cold and somewhat cloudy-

But Pierre could carry his narrative no further, for Sister Hyacinthe had risen to her feet and was vigorously clapping her hands. "My children," she exclaimed, "it is past nine o'clock. Silencel silencel"

The train had indeed just passed Lamothe, and was rolling with a dull rumble across a sea of darkness-the endless plains of the Landes, which the night submerged. For ten minutes already not a sound ought to have been heard in the earriage, one and all ought to have been sleeping or suffering uncomplainingly. However, a mutiny broke out.

Ohl Sister!" exclaimed Marie, whose eyes were sparkling, "allow us just another short quarter of an hour! We have got to the most interesting part."

Ten, twenty voices took up the cry: "Oh yes, Sister, please do let us have another short quarter of an hour!"

They all wished to hear the continuation, burning with as much curiosity as though they had not known the story, so captivated were they by the touches of compassionate human feeling which Pierre introduced into his narrative. Their glances never left him, all their heads were stretched towards him, fantastically illumined by the flickering light of the lamps. And it was not only the sick who displayed this interest; the ten women occupying the compartment at the far end of the carriage had also become impassioned, and, happy at not missing a single word, turned their poor ugly faces, now beautiful by naïve faith.

"No, I cannot!" Sister Hyacinthe at first declared; "the rules are very strict—you must be silent."

However, she weakened, she herself feeling so interested in the tale, that she could detect her heart beating under her stomacher. Then Marie again repeated her request in an entreating tone; whilst her father. M. de Guersaint, who had listened like one lugely amused, declared that they would all fall ill if the story were not continued. And thereupon, seeing Madame de Jonquière smile with an indulgent air. Sister Hyaeinthe ended by consenting.

"Well then," said she, "I will allow you another short quarter of an hour; but only a short quarter of an hour, mind. That is understood, is it not? For I should otherwise be in fault."

Pierre had waited quietly without attempting to intervene. And he resumed his narrative in the same penetrating voice as before, a voice in which his own doubts were softened by pity for those who suffer and who hope.

The scene of the story was now transferred to Lourdes, to the Rue des Petits Fossés, a narrow, tortuous, mournful street taking a downward course between humble houses and roughly plastered dead walls. The Soubirons family occupied a single room on the ground floor of one of these sorry habitations, a room at the end of a dark passage, in which seven persons were huddled together, the father, the mother, and five children. You could scarcely see in the chamber; from the tiny, damp inner courtyard of the house there came but a greenish light. And in that room they slept, all of a heap; and there also they ate, when they had bread. For some time past the father, a miller by trade, could only with difficulty obtain work as a journeyman. And it was from that dark hole, that lowly wretchedness, that Bernadette, the elder girl, with Marie her sister, and Jeanne, a little friend of the neighbourhood, went out to pick up dead wood, on the cold

February Thursday already spoken of.

Then the beautiful tale was unfolded at length; how the three girls followed the bank of the Gave from the other side of the castle, and how they ended by finding themselves on the Ile du Chalet in front of the rock of Massabielle, from which they were only separated by the narrow stream divertedfrom the Gave, and used for working the mill of Sêvy. It was a wild spot, whither the common herdsman often brought the pigs of the neighbourhood, which, when showers suddenly came on, would take shelter under this rock of Massabielle, at whose base there was a kind of grotto of no great depth, blocked at the entrance by eglantine and brambles. The girls found dead wood very scarce that day, but at last on seeing on the other side of the stream quite a gleaning of branches deposited there by the torrent, Marie and Jeanne crossed over through the water; whilst Bernadette, more delicate than they were, a trifle youngladyfied, perhaps, remained on the bank lamenting, and not daring to wet her feet. She was suffering slightly from humour in the head, and her mother had expressly bidden her to wrap herself in her capulet, a large white capulet which contrasted vividly with her old, black woollen dress. When she found that her companions would not help her, she resignedly made up her mind to take off her sabots, and pull down her stockings. It was then about noon, the three strokes of the Angelus rang out from the parish church, rising into the broad calm winter sky, which was somewhat veiled by fine fleecy clouds. And it was then that a great agitation arose within her, resounding in her ears with such a tempestuous roar that she fancied a hurricane had descended from the mountains, and was passing over her. But she looked at the trees and was stupefied, for not a leaf was stirring. Then she thought that she had been mistaken, and was about to pick up her sabots, when again the great gust swept through her; but, this time, the disturbance in the ears reached her eyes, she no longer saw the trees, but was dazzled by a whiteness, a kind of bright light which seemed to her to settle itself against the rock, in a narrow, lofty slit above the grotto, not unlike an ogival window of a cathedral. In her fright she fell upon her knees. What could it be, Mon Dicu? Sometimes, during bad weather, when her asthma oppressed her more than usual, she spent very bad nights, incessantly dreaming dreams which were often painful, and whose stilling effect she retained on awaking, even when she had ceased to remember anything. Flames would surround her, the sun would flash before her face. Had she dreamt in that fashion during the previous night? Was this the continuation of some forgotten dream? However, little by little a form became outlined, she believed that she could distinguish a figure which the vivid light rendered intensely white. In her fear lest it should be the devil, for her mind was haunted by tales of witeheraft, she began to tell her beads. And when the light had slowly faded away, and she had crossed the canal and joined Marie and Jeanne, she was surprised to find that neither of them had seen anything whilst they were picking up the wood in front of the Grotto. On their way back to Lourdes the three girls talked together. So she, Bernadette, had seen something, then? What was it? At first, feeling uneasy, and somewhat ashamed, she would not answer; but at last she said that she had seen something white.

&lt;sup>1</sup> This is a kind of hood, more generally known among the Bearnese peasantry as a sarot. Whilst forming a coif it also completely covers the back and shoulders.—Trans.

but at last she said that she had seen something white.

From this the rumours started and grew. The Soubirous, on heing made aequainted with the circumstance, evinced much displeasure at such childish nonsense, and told their daughter that she was not to return to the rock of Massabielle. All the children of the neighbourhood, however, were already repeating the tale, and when Sunday came the parents had to give way, and allow Bernadette to betake herself to the Grotto with a bottle of holy water to ascertain if it were really the devil whom one had to deal with. She then again beheld the light, the figure became more clearly defined, and smiled upon her, evincing no fear whatever of the holy water. And, on the ensuing Thursday, she once more returned to the spot accompanied by several persons, and then for the first time the radiant lady assumed sufficient corporality to speak, and say to her: "Do me the kindness to come here for fifteen days."

Thus, little by little, the lady had assumed a precise appearance. The something elad in white had become indeed a lady more beautiful than a queen, of a kind such as is only seen in pictures. At first, in presence of the questions with which all the neighbours plied her from morning till evening, Bernadette had hesitated, disturbed, perhaps, by scruples of conscience. But then, as though prompted by the very interrogatories to which she was subjected, she seemed to perceive the figure which she had beheld, more plainly, so that it definitively assumed life, with lines and hues from which the child, in her after-descriptions, never departed. The lady's eyes were blue and very mild, her mouth was rosy and smiling, the oval of her face expressed both the grace of youth and of maternity. Below the veil covering her head and falling to her heels, only a glimpse was caught of her admirable fair hair, which was slightly curled. Her robe, which was of dazzling whiteness, must have been of some material unknown on carth, some material woven of the sun's rays. Her sash, of the same hue as the heavens, was fastened loosely about her, its long ends streaming downwards, with the light airiness of morning. Her chaplet wound about her right arm, had beeds of a milky whiteness, whilst the links and the cross were of gold. And on her bare feet, on her adorable feet of virgin snow, flowered two golden roses, the mystic roses of this divine mother's immaculate flesh.

Where was it that Bernadette had seen this Blessed Virgin, of such traditionally simple composition, unadorned by a single jewel, having but the primitive grace imagined by the painters of a people in its childhood? In which illustrated book belonging to her foster-mother's brother, the good priest, who read such attractive stories, had she beheld this Virgin? Or in what picture, or what statuette, or what stained-glass window of the painted and gilded church where she had spent so many evenings whilst growing up? And whence, above all things, had come those golden roses poised on the Virgin's feet, that piously imagined florescence of woman's flesh—from what romance of chivalry, from what story told after catechism by the Abbé Ader, from what unconscious dream indulged in under the shady foliage of Bartrês, whilst ever and ever repeating that haunting Angelic Salutation?

Pierre's voice had acquired a yet more feeling tone, for if he did not say all these things to the simple-minded folks who were listening to him, still the human explanation of all these prodigies which the feeling of doubt in the depths of his being strove to supply, imparted to his narrative a quiver of sympathetic, fraternal love. He loved Bernadette the better for the great charm of her hallucination-that lady of such gracious access, such perfect amiability, such politeness in appearing and disappearing so appropriately. At first the great light would show itself, then the vision took form, came and went, leant forward, moved about, floating imperceptibly, with ethereal lightness; and when it vanished the glow lingered for yet another moment, and then disappeared like a star fading away. No lady in this world could have such a white and rosy face, with a beauty so akin to that of the Virgins on the picture cards given to children at their first communions. And it was strange that the cglantine of the Grotto did not even hurt her adorable bare feet, blooming with golden flowers.

Pierre, however, at once proceeded to recount the other apparitions. The fourth and fifth occurred on the Friday and the Saturday; but the Lady, who shone so brightly and who had not yet told her name, contented herself on these occasions with smiling and saluting without pronouncing a single word. On the Sunday, however, she wept, and said to Bernadette, "Pray for sinners." On the Monday, to the child's great grief, she did not appear, wishing, no doubt, to try her. But on the Tuesday she confided to her a secret which concerned her (the girl) alone, a secret which she was never to divulge; and then she at last told her what mission it was that she entrusted to her: "Go and tell the priests," she said, "that they must build a chapel here." On the Wednesday she frequently murmured the word "Penitence! penitence! penitence!" which the child repeated, afterwards kissing the earth. On the Thursday the Lady said to her; "Go, and drink, and wash at the spring, and eat of the grass that is beside it," words which the visionary ended by understanding, when in the depths of the Grotto a source suddenly sprang up beneath her fingers. And this was the miraele of the enchanted fountain.

Then the second week ran its course. The Lady did not appear on the Friday, but was punctual on the five following days, repeating her commands and gazing with a smile at the humble girl whom she had chosen to do her bidding, and who, on her side, told her beads at each apparition, kissed the earth and repaired on her knees to the source, there to drink and wash. At last, on Thursday, March 4, the last day of these mystical assignations, the Lady requested more pressingly than before that a chapel might be creeted in order that the nations might come thither in procession from all parts of the earth. So far, however, in reply to all Bernadette's appeals, she had refused to say who she was; and it was only three weeks later, on Thursday, March 25, that, joining her hands together, and raising her eyes to Heaven, she said: "I am the Immaculate Conception." On two other occasions, at somewhat long intervals, April 7 and July 16, she again appeared: the first time to perform the miracle of the lighted taper, that taper above which the child, plunged in cestasy, for a long time unconsciously left her hand, without burning it; and the second time to bid Bernadette farewell, to favour her with a last smile, and a last inclination of the head full of charming politeness. This made eighteen apparitions all told; and never again did the Lady show herself.

Whilst Pierre went on with his heautiful, marvellous story, so soothing to the wretched, he evoked for himself a vision of that

Whilst Pierre went on with his beautiful, marvellous story, so soothing to the wretched, he evoked for himself a vision of that pitiable, lovable Bernadette, whose sufferings had flowered so wonderfully. As a doctor had roughly expressed it, this girl of fourteen, at a critical period of her life, already ravaged, too, by astluna, was, after all, simply an exceptional victim of hysteria,

In a like way, it will be remembered, the apparition at La Salette confided a secret to Melanie and Maximin (see ante, note, p. 72). There can be little doubt that Bernadette was acquainted with the story of the miracle of La Salette.—Trans.

afflicted with a degenerate heridity and lapsing into infancy. there were no violent crises in her case, if there were no stiffening of the muscles during her attacks, if she retained a precise recollection of her dreams, the reason was that her case was peculiar to herself, and she added, so to say, a new and very curious form to all the forms of hysteria known at the time. only begin when things cannot be explained; and science, so far, knows and can explain so little, so infinitely do the phenomena of disease vary according to the nature of the patient! But how many shepherdesses there had been before Bernadette who had: seen the Virgin in a similar way, amidst all the same childish nonsense! Was it not always the same story, the Lady clad in light, the secret confided, the spring bursting forth, the mission which had to be fulfilled, the miracles whose enchantments would convert the masses? And was not the personal appearance of the Virgin always in accordance with a poor child's dreams-akin to some coloured figure in a missal, an ideal compounded of traditional beauty, gentleness, and politeness. And the same dreams showed themselves in the naïveté of the means which were to be employed, and of the object which was to be attained -the deliverance of nations, the building of churches, the processional pilgrimages of the faithful! Then, too, all the words which fell from Heaven resembled one another, calls for penitence, promises of help; and in this respect, in Bernadette's case, the only new feature was that most extraordinary declaration: "I am the Immaculate Conception," which burst forth-very usefullyas the recognition by the Blessed Virgin herself of the dogma promulgated by the Court of Rome but three years previously! It was not the Immaculate Virgin who appeared: no, it was the Immaculate Conception, the abstraction itself, the thing, the dogma, so that one might well ask oneself if really the Virgin had spoken in such a fashion. As for the other words, it was possible that Bernadette had heard them somewhere and stored them up in some unconscious nook of her memory. these-"I am the Immaculate Conception"-whence had they come as though expressly to fortify a dogma-still bitterly discussed—with such prodigious support as the direct testimony of the Mother conceived without sin? At this thought Pierre, who was convinced of Bernadette's absolute good faith, who refused to believe that she had been the instrument of a fraud, began to waver, deeply agitated, feeling his belief in truth totter within him.

The apparitions, however, had caused intense emotion at Lourdes; crowds flocked to the spot, miracles began, and those inevitable persecutions broke out which ensure the triumph of new religions. Abbé Peyramale, the parish priest of Lourdes, an extremely honest man, with an upright, vigorous mind, was able in all truth to declare that he did not know this child, that she had not yet been seen at catechism. Where was the pressure then, where the lesson learnt by heart? There was nothing but those years of childhood spent at Bartrès, the first teachings of Abbé Ader, conversations possibly, religious ceremonies in honcur of the recently proclaimed dogma, or simply the gift of one of those commemorative medals which had been scattered in profusion. Never did Abbé Ader, reappear upon the seene, he who had predicted the mission of the future visionary. tined to remain apart from Bernadette and her future career, he who, the first, had seen her little soul blossom in his pious hands. And yet all the unknown forces that had spring from that sequestered village, from that nook of greenery where superstition and poverty of intelligence prevailed, were still making themselves telt, disturbing the brains of men, disseminating the contagion of the mysterious. It was rememberd that a shepherd of Argelès, speaking of the rock of Massabielle, had prophesied that great things would take place there. Other children, moreover, now fell in ecstasy with their eyes dilated and their limbs quivering with convulsions, but these only saw the devil. A whirlwind of madness seemed to be passing over the region. An old lady of Lourdes declared that Bernadette was simply a witch and that she had herself seen the toad's foot in her eye. But for the others, for the thousands of pilgrims who hastened to the spot, she was a saint, and they kissed her garments. Sobs burst forth and frenzy seemed to seize upon the souls of the beholders, when she fell upon her knees before the Crotto, a lighted taper in her right hand, whilst with the left she told the beads of her rosary. She became very pale and quite beautiful, transfigured, so to say. Her features gently ascended in her face, lengthened into an expression of extraordinary beatitude, whilst her eyes filled with light, and her lips parted as though she were speaking words which could not be heard. And it was quite certain that she had no will of her own lest her, penetrated as she was by her dream, possessed by it to such a point in the confined, exclusive sphere in which she to such a point in the confined, exclusive sphere in which she lived, that she continued dreaming it even when awake, and thus accepted it as the only indisputable reality, prepared to testify to it even at the cost of her blood, repeating it over and over again, obstinately, stubbornly clinging to it, and never varying in the details she gave. She did not lie, for she did not know, could not and would not desire anything apart from it.

Forgetful of the flight of time, Pierre was now sketching a charming nicture of old Lourdes that pious little town clumbering

Forgetful of the flight of time, Pierre was now sketching a charming picture of old Lourdes, that pious little town, slumbering at the foot of the Pyrenees. The castle, perched on a rock at the point of intersection of the seven valleys of Lavedan, had formerly been the key of the mountain districts. But in Bernadette's time, it had become a mere dismantled, ruined pile, at the entrance of a road leading nowhere. Modern life found its march stayed by a formidable rampart of lofty, snow-capped peaks, and only the trans-Pyrenean railway-had it been constructed-could have established an active circulation of social life in that sequestered nook where human existence stagnated like dead water. Forgotten, therefore, Lourdes remained slumbering, happy and sluggish amidst its old-time peacefulness, with its narrow, pebble-paved streets and its black houses with dressings of marble. The old roofs were still all massed on the eastern side of the castle; the Rue de la Grotte, then called the Rue du Bois, was but a deserted and often impassable road; no houses stretched down to the Gave as now, and the scum-laden waters rolled through a perfect solitude of pollard willows and tall grass. On weekdays but few people passed across the Place du Marcadal, such as housewives hastening on errands, and petty cits airing their leisure hours; and you had to wait till Sundays or fair days to find the inhabitants rigged out in their best clothes and assembled on the Champ Commun, in company with the crowd of graziers who had come down from the distant tablelands with their cattle. During the season when people resort to the Pyrenean waters, the passage of the visitors to Cauterets and Bangnères also brought some animation; diligences passed through the town twice a day: but they came from Pau by a wretched road, and had to ford the Lapaca, which often overflowed its banks. Then climbing the steep ascent of the Rue Basse, they skirted the terrace of the church, which was shaded by large elms. And what soft peacefulness prevailed in and around that old semi-Spanish church, full of ancient carvings, columns, screens, and statues, peopled with visionary patches of gilding and painted flesh, which time had mellowed and which you faintly discerned as by the light of mystical lamps! The whole population came there to worship, to fill their eyes with the dream of the Mysterious. There were no unbelievers, the inhabitants of Lourdes were a people of primitive faith; each corporation marched behind the banner of its saint, brotherhoods of all kinds united the entire town, on festival mornings, in one large Christian family. And, as with some exquisite flower that has grown in the soil of its choice, great purity of life reigned there. There was not even a resort of debauchery for young men to wreck their lives, and the girls, one and all, grew up with the perfume and beauty of innocence, under the eyes of the Blessed Virgin, Tower of Ivory and Seat of Wisdom.

And how well one could understand that Bernadette, born in that holy soil, should flower in it, like one of nature's roses budding in the wayside bushes! She was indeed the very florescence of that region of ancient belief and rectitude; she would certainly not have sprouted elsewhere; she could only appear and develop there, amidst that belated race, amidst the slumberous peacefulness of a child-like people, under the moral discipline of religion. And what intence love at once burst forth all around her! What blind confidence was displayed in her mission, what immense consolation and hope came to human hearts on the very morrow of the first miracles! A long cry of relief had greeted the cure of old Bour-riette recovering his sight, and of little Justin Bouhohorts coming to life again in the icy water of the spring. At last, then, the Blessed Virgin was intervening in favour of those who despaired, foreing that unkind mother, Nature, to be just and charitable. This was divine omnipotence returning to reign on earth, sweeping the laws of the world aside in order to work the happiness of the suffering and the poor. The miracles multiplied, blazed forth, from day to day more and more extraordinary, like unimpeachable proof of Bernadette's veracity. And she was, indeed, the rose of the divine garden, whose deeds shed perfume, the rose who beholds all the other flowers of grace and salvation spring into being around her.

Pierre had reached this point of his story, and was again enumerating the miracles, on the point of recounting the prodigious triumph of the Grotto, when Sister Hyacinthe, awaking with a start from the eestacy into which the narrative had plunged her, hastily rose to her feet. "Really, really," said she, "there is no sense in it. It will soon be eleven o'clock."

This was true. They had left Moreeux behind them, and would now soon be at Mont de Marsan. So Sister Hyacinthe clapped her hands once more, and added: "Silence, my children, silence!"
This time they did not dare to rebel, for they felt she was in the right, they were unreasonable. But how greatly they regretted not hearing the continuation, how vexed they were that the story should cease when only half told! The ten women in the further compartment even let a murmur of disappointment escape them; whilst the sick, their faces still outstretched, their dilated eyes gazing upon the light of hope, seemed to be yet listening. Those miracles which ever and ever returned to their minds filled them with unlimited, haunting, supernatural joy.

"And don't let me hear any one breathe even," added Sister Hyacinthe gaily, "or otherwise I shall impose penance on you."

Madame de Jonquiêre laughed good naturedly. "You must obey, my, children," she said; "be good and get to sleep, so that you may have strength to pray at the Grotto to-morrow with all your hearts."

; Then silence fell, nobody spoke any further; and the only sounds were those of the rumbling of the wheels and the jolting of the train as it was carried along at full speed through the black night.

Pierre, however, was unable to sleep. Beside him, M. de Guersaint was already snoring lightly, looking very happy despite the hardness of his seat. For a time the young priest saw Marie's eyes wide open, still full of all the radiance of the marvels that he had related... For a long while she kept them ardently fixed upon his own, but at last closed them, and then he knew not whether she was sleeping, or with eyelids simply closed was living the everlasting miracle over again. Some of the sufferers were dreaming aloud, giving vent to bursts of laughter which unconscious moans interrupted. Perhaps they beheld the Archangels opening their flesh to wrest their diseases from them. Others, restless with insomnia, turned over and over, stifling their sobs and gazing fixedly into the darkness. And, with a shudder born of all the mystery he had evoked, Pierre, distracted, no longer master of himself in that delirious sphere of fraternal suffering, ended by hating his very mind, and, drawn into close communion with all those humble folks, sought to believe like them. be the use of that physiological inquiry into Bernadette's case, so full of gaps and intricacies? Why should he not accept her as a messenger from the spheres beyond, as one of the elect chosen for the divine mystery? Doctors were but ignorant men with rough and brutal hands, and it would be so delightful to fall asleep in childlike faith, in the enchanted gardens of the impossible. And for a moment indeed he surrendered himself, experiencing a delightful feeling of comfort, no longer seeking to explain anything, but accepting the visionary with her sumptuous cortège of miracles, and relying on God to think and determine for him. Then he looked out through the window, which they did not dare to open on account of the consumptive patients, and beheld the immeasurable night which enwrapped the country across which the train was fleeing. The storm must have burst forth there; the sky was now of an admirable nocturnal purity, as though cleansed by the masses of fallen water. Large stars shone out in the dark velvet, alone illumining, with their mysterious gleams, the silent refreshed fields, which incessantly displayed the black solitude of their slumber. And across the Landes. through the valleys, between the hills, that carriage of wretchedness and suffering rolled on and on, overheated, pestilential, rueful, and wailing, amidst the serenity of the August night, so lovely and so mild.

They had passed Riscle at one in the morning. Between the jolting, the painful, hallucinatory silence still continued. At two o'clock, as they reached Vic-de-Bigorre, low moans were heard; the bad state of the line, with the unbearable spreading tendency of the train's motion, was sorely shaking the patients. It was only at Tarbes, at half-past two, that silence was at length broken, and that morning prayers were said, though black night still reigned around them. There came first the "Pater," and then the "Ave," the "Credo," and the supplication to God to grant them the happiness of a glorious day.

"O God, vouchsafe me sufficient strength that I may avoid all that is evil, do all that is good, and suffer uncomplainingly every pain."

And now there was to be no further stoppage until they reached Lourdes. Barely three more quarters of an hour, and Lourdes, with all its vast hopes, would blaze forth in the midst of that night, so long and eruel. Their painful awakening was enfevered by the thought; a final agitation arose amidst the morning discomfort, as the abominable sufferings began afresh.

Sister Hyacinthe, however, was especially anxious about the strange man, whose sweat-covered face she had been continually He had so far managed to keep alive, she watching him without a pause, never having once closed her eyes, but unremittingly listening to his faint breathing with the stubborn desire to take him to the holy Grotto before he died.

All at once, however, she felt frightened; and addressing herself to Madame de Jonquière, she hastily exclaimed, "Pray pass me the vinegar-bottle at once—I can no longer hear him breathe."

For an instant, indeed, the man's faint breathing had ceased. His eyes were still closed, his lips parted; he could not have been paler, he had an ashen hue, and was cold. And the carriage was still rolling along with its ceaseless rattle of coupling-irons; the speed of the train seemed even to have increased.

"I will rub his temples," resumed Sister Hyacinthe. "Help me, do!"

But, at a more violent jolt of the train, the man suddenly fell from the seat, face downward.

"Ahl mon Dieu, help me pick him upl"

They picked him up, and found him dead. And they had to scat him in his corner again, with his back resting against the wood-work. He remained there erect, his torso stiffened, and his head wagging slightly at each successive jolt. Thus the train eontinued carrying him along, with the same thundering noise of wheels, while the engine, well pleased, no doubt, to be reaching its destination, began whistling shrilly, giving vent to quite a flourish of delirious joy as it sped through the calm night.

And then came the last and seemingly endless half-hour of the journey, in company with that wretched corpse. Two big tears lad rolled down Sister Hyacinthe's checks, and with her hands joined she had begun to pray. The whole carriage shuddered with terror at sight of that terrible companion who was being taken, too late, alast to the Blessed Virgin.

Hope, however, proved stronger than sorrow or pain, and although all the sufferings there assembled awoke and grew again, irritated by overwhelming weariness, a song of joy nevertheless proclaimed the sufferers triumphal entry into the Land of Miracles. Amidst the tears which their pains drew from them, the exasperated and howling sick began to chant the "Ave maris Stella" with a growing elamour in which their lamentations finally turned into cries of hope.

Marie had again taken Pierre's hand between her little feverish fingers. "Oh, mon Dieul" said she, "to think that poor man is dead, and I feared so much that it was I who would die before arriving. And we are there—there at last!"

The priest was trembling with intense emotion. "It means that you are to be cured, Marie," he replied, "and that I myself deall be cured if you prov. for means shall be cured if you pray for me—"

The engine was now whistling in a yet louder key in the depths of the bluey darkness. They were nearing their destination. The lights of Lourdes already shone out on the horizon. Then the whole train again sang a canticle—the rhymed story of Bernadette, that endless ballad of six times ten couplets, in which the Angelic Salutation ever returns as a refrain, all besetting and distracting, opening to the human mind the portals of the heaven of ecstasy:—

"It was the hour for ev'ning pray'r; Soft bells chimed on the chilly air, Ave, ave, ave Maria!

The maid stood on the torrent's bank, A breeze arose, then swittly sank, Ave, ave, ave Maria!

And she beheld, e'en as it fell, The Virgin on Massabielle. Ave, ave, ave Maria!

All white appeared the Lady chaste, A zone of heaven round her waist, Ave, ave, ave Maria!

Two golden roses, pure and sweet, Bloomed brightly on her naked feet. Ave, ave, ave Maria!

Upon her arm, all white and round, Her chaplet's milky beads were wound. Ave, ave, ave Marial

The maid prayed on till from her eyes, The vision sped to Paradise. Ave, ave, ave Maria!"

THE SECOND DAY

THE SECOND DAY

THE TRAIN ARRIVES

It was twenty minutes past three by the clock of the Lourdes railway station, the dial of which was illumined by a reflector.

Under the slanting roof sheltering the platform, a hundred yards or so in length, some shadowy forms went to and fro, resignedly waiting. Only a red signal light peeped out of the black countryside, far away.

. Two of the promenaders suddenly halted. The taller of them, a Father of the Assumption, none other indeed than the Reverend Father Fourcade, director of the national pilgrimage, who had reached Lourdes on the previous day, was a man of sixty, looking superb in his black cloak with its large hood. His fine head, with its clear, domineering eyes and thick grizzly beard, was the head of a general whom an intelligent determination to conquer inflames. In consequence, however, of a sudden attack of gout he slightly dragged one of his legs, and was leaning on the shoulder of his companion, Dr. Bonamy, the practitioner attached to the Miraele Verification Office, a short, thickset man, with a square shaped, clean-shaven face, which had dull, blurred eves and a tranquil cast of features.

Father Foureade had stopped to question the station-master whom he perceived running out of his office, "Will the white train be very late, monsieur?" he asked.

"No, your reverence. It hasn't lost more than ten minutes; it will be here at the half-hour. It's the Bayonne train which worries me; it ought to have passed through already."

So saying, he ran off to give an order; but soon came back, again, his slim, nervous figure displaying marked signs of agitation. He lived, indeed, in a state of high fever throughout the period of the great pilgrimages. Apart from the usual service, he that day expected eighteen trains, containing more than fifteen thousand passengers. The grey and the blue trains which had started from Paris the first had already arrived at the regulation hour. But the delay in the arrival of the white train was very troublesome, the more so as the Bayonne express—which passed over the same rails—had not yet been signalled. It was easy to understand, therefore, what incessant watchfulness was necessary. not a second passing without the entire staff of the station being called upon to exercise its vigilance.

"In ten minutes then?" repeated Father Foureade.

"Yes, in ten minutes, unless I'm ohliged to close the line!" cried the station-master as he hastened into the telegraph office. Father Fourcade and the doctor slowly resumed their promenade. The thing which astonished them was that no serious accident had ever happened in the midst of such a fearful scramble. In past times especially, the most terrible disorder had prevailed. Father Fourcade complacently recalled the first pilgrimage which he had organised and led, in 1875; the terrible endless journey without pillows or mattresses, the patients exhausted, half dead, with no means of reviving them at hand; and then the arrival at Lourdes, the train evacuated in confusion, no matériel in readiness, no straps, nor stretchers, nor carts. But now, there was a powerful organisation; a hospital awaited the sick, who were no longer reduced to lying upon straw in sheds. What a shock for those unhappy ones! What force of will in the man of faith who led them to the scene of miracles! The reverend of faith who led them to the scene of miracles! The reverend statisher smiled gently at the thought of the work which he had accomplished.

Then, still leaning on the doctor's shoulder, he began to question him; "How many pilgrims did you have last year?" he asked: "About two hundred thousand. That is still the average. In hundred thousand, But to bring that about an exceptional hundred thousand, But to bring that about an exceptional occasion was needed with a great effort of propaganda. Such wast masses cannot be collected together every day."

vast masses cannot be collected together every day.".

A pause followed, and then Father Fourcade murmured: "No doubt. Still the blessing of Heaven attends our endeavours; our work thrives more and more. We have collected more than two hundred thousand francs in donations for this journey, and God will be with us, there will be many cures for you to proclaim to-morrow, I am sure of it." Then, breaking off, he inquired: "Has not Father Dargeles come here?"

prosperity of their business. Indeed, they turned even their money and toiling without a pause to increase the triumphant were behind the vast stage, like a hidden sovereign power, coining ception disappeared in this fashion, it could be divined that they same time, however, although the Fathers of the Immaculate Consauly on the look-out for paragraphs for his newspaper. At the mainuating Father Dargeles; but he was met everywhere, inceswhich retained a ruddy, mournful reflection of the soil, did not even show himself. Of the whole community you only saw little, inclinion as it it had been fashioned with a bill-hook, and a worn face every responsibility. Their superior, Father Capdebarthe, a tall, peasant-like man, with a knotty frame, a big head which looked the Basilica; they seemed to surrender every key together with Their ommpotence was no longer felt either at the Crotto or at they evinced a kind of affectation in disappearing from the scene. Chartres, Troyes, Rheims, Sens, Orleans, Blois, and Poitiers joined, Paris, which crowds of faithful Catholics from Cambrai, Arras, vernmbyon came to the town with the national pilgrimage from were the absolute masters there; though, when the frathers of the Conception whom the Bishop had installed at Lourdes and who He belonged to the Order of the Fathers of the Immaculate know. Father Dargelès was the editor of the Journal de la Grotte. Dr. Bonamy waved his hand as though to say that he did not humility to account. "It's true that we have had to get up early—two in the morning," resumed Father Fourcade gaily. "But I wished to be here. What would my poor children have said indeed if I had not come?"

He was alluding to the sick pilgrims, those who were so much flesh for miracle-working; and it was a fact that he had never missed coming to the station, no matter what the hour; to meet that woeful white train, that train which brought such grievous suffering with it.

"Five-and-twenty minutes past three-only another five minutes now," exclaimed Dr. Bonamy, repressing a yawn as he glanced at the clock; for, despite his obsequious air, he was at bottom very much annoyed at having had to get out of bed so early. However, he continued his slow promenade with Father Fourcade along that platform which resembled a covered walk, pacing up and down in the dense night which the gas jets here and there illumined with patches of yellow light. Little parties, dimly outlined, composed of priests and gentlemen in frock coats, with a solitary officer of dragoons, went to and fro incessantly, talking together the while in discreet murmuring tones. Other people, scated on benches, ranged along the station wall, were also chatting or putting their patience to proof with their glances wandering away into the black stretch of country before them. doorways of the offices and waiting-rooms, which were brilliantly lighted, looked like great holes in the darkness, and all was flaring in the refreshment-room, where you could see the marble tables and the counter laden with bottles and glasses and baskets of bread and fruit.

On the right hand, beyond the roofing of the platform, there was a confused swarming of people. There was here a goods gate, by which the siek were taken out of the station, and a mass of stretches, litters and hand-carts, with piles of pillows and mattresses, obstructed the broad walk. Three parties of bearers were also assembled here, persons of well-nigh every class, but more particularly young men of good society, all wearing red, orange-tipped crosses and straps of yellow leather. them too had adopted the Bearnese cap, the convenient headgear of the region; and a few, clad as though they were bound on some distant expedition, displayed wonderful gaiters reaching to their knees. Some were smoking, whilst others, installed in their little vehicles, slept or read newspapers by the light of the neighbouring gas-jets. One group, standing apart, was discussing some service question.

Suddenly however, one and all began to salute. A paternal-looking man, with a heavy but good-natured face, lighted by large blue eyes like those of a credulous child, was approaching. It was Baron Suire, the President of the Hospitality of Our Lady of Salvation. He possessed a great fortune and occupied a high position at Toulouse.

"Where is Berthaud?" he inquired of one bearer after another, with a busy air. "Where is Berthaud? I must speak to him." The others answered, volunteering contradictory information.

ing the ambulance vehicles. And they thereupon offered to go affirmed that he must be in the courtyard of the station inspectthey had seen him with the Reverend Father Fourcade, others Berthaud was their Superintendent, and whilst some said that and fetch him.

"No, no, thank you," replied the Baron. "I shall manage to

"Hoeym mid buil

Despite all this, however, Berthaud possessed no small amount of good sense, and being of a gay disposition displayed a kind one of those miracles which He worked so lavishly at the Crotto. Republic, and that God alone could re-establish the Monarchy by vear to Lourdes in order to "demonstrate"; convinced as he was Our Lady of Salvation as a sort of protest, repairing year after ing an insulting letter to the Minister of Justice. And he had never since laid down his arms, but had joined the Hospitality of when he had resigned his post in a blusterous fashion, by address-May, until that of the decree on the Religious Communities,? of the parliamentary revolution of the twenty-fourth of (public prosecutor) in a town of the south of France from the reactionary opinions, he had been Procureur de la République Belonging to a militant Legitimist family and holding extremely some face and carefully trimmed whiskers of a lawyer-like pattern. Bearers was a man of forty, with a broad, regular-featured, hand-The Superintendent of the pending the arrival of the train. his young friend Cérard de Peyrelongue, by way of occupation self on a bench at the other end of the station, was talking with Whilst this was happening, Berthaud, who had just seated him-

"And so, my dear Cerard," he said to the young man seated age remained at Lourdes.

had to provide for during the three days that the national pilgrimof jovial charity towards the poor sufferers whose transport he

"Why yes, if I can find such a wife as I want," replied the ter. "Come, cousin, give me some good advice." beside him, "your marriage is really to come off this year?"

every summer to Lourdes, in the vague hope that amidst the world; and so he had joined the Hospitality, and betook himself capable of helping him to push both forward and upward in the he desired in his native province-a well-connected young woman nemely ambittous, he had been unable to find such a wife as at the utmost some seven or eight thousand francs a year. Tarbes, where his father and mother had lately died, leaving him pronounced nose and prominent cheek-bones, belonged to Cerard de Peyrelongue, a short, thin, carroty young man, with

, The parliamentary revolution of May 1873 by which M=Thice with was overthrown and Marshal MacMahon installed in his place with the object of restoring the monarchy in France -Trans of restoring the monarchy in France -Trans  $^2$ M. Grevy's decree by which the Jesuits were expelled -Trans

mass of believers, the torrent of devout mammas and daughters which flowed thither, he might find the family whose help he needed to enable him to make his way in this terrestrial sphere. However, he remained in perplexity, for if, on the one hand, he already had several young ladies in view, on the other, none of them completely satisfied him.

"Eh, cousin? You will advise me, won't you?" he said to Berthaud. "You are a man of experience. There is Mademoiselle Lemercier who comes here with her aunt. She is very rich; according to what is said she has over a million francs. But she doesn't belong to our set, and besides I think her a bit of a madeap."

Berthaud nodded. "I told you so; if I were you I should choose little Raymonde, Mademoiselle de Jonquière."

"But she hasn't a copper!"

"That's true—she has barely enough to pay for her board. But she is fairly goodlooking, she has been well brought up, and she has no extravagant tastes. That is the really important point, for what is the use of marrying a rich girl if she squanders the dowry she brings you? Besides, I know Madame and Mademoisselle de Jonquière very well, I meet them all through the winter in the most influential drawingrooms of Paris. And, finally, don't forget the girl's uncle, the diplomatist, who has had the painful courage to remain in the service of the Republic. He will he able to do whatever he pleases for his niece's husband."

For a moment Gérard seemed shaken, and then he relapsed into perplexity. "But she hasn't a copper," he said, "no, not a copper. It's too stiff. I am quite willing to think it over, but it really frightens me too much.'

This time Berthaud burst into a frank laugh. "Come, you are ambitious, so you must be daring. I tell you that it means the Secretaryship of an embassy before two years are over. By the way, Madame and Mademoiselle de Jonquière are in the white train which we are waiting for. Make up your mind and pay your court at once."

"No, nol Later on. I want to think it over."

At this moment they were interrupted, for Baron Suire, who had already once gone by without perceiving them, so completely did the darkness enshroud them in that retired corner, had just recognised the ex-public prosecutor's good-natured laugh. And thereupon, with the volubility of a man whose head is easily unhinged, he gave him several orders respecting the vehicles and the transport service, deploring the circumstance that it would be impossible to conduct the patients to the Grotto immediately on their arrival, as it was yet so extremely early. It had therefore been decided that they should in the first instance be taken to the Hospital of Our Lady of Dolours, where they would be able to rest a while after their trying journey.

was already acquainted with Gérard. ready to dispute their authenticity. Having lived at Tarbes, he nounced itself with regard to the miracles; and he seemed quite superior decisions; but the Church-the Holy See-had not prosparkling smile of a sceptic above all idolatry, gleamed in the depths of his fine eyes. He certainly believed, and bowed to he did not come to Lourdes in any official capacity, but simply for his pleasure, as so many other people did; and the bright, Very amiable and distinguished in his manners, among women. his person perfumed, he was not unnaturally a great tavourite shoulders of a worldly priest. With his hair well combed, and a superb head—such a head as one might expect to find on the Hermoises, who was barely eight-and-thirty years of age and had what measures should be adopted Gérard shook hands with a what measures should be adopted Gérard shook hands with a Whilst the Baron and the Superintendent were thus settling for it all interests me so much." Still, as you see, I stop on, know what train she will come by. to meet a lady-one of my former Paris penitents-but I don't waiting for the trains in the middle of the night! I have come wod" , min of bias impressive it is-isn't-this əц

Then another priest, an old country priest, having come to sit

rose and the mountains appeared. theatrical effect which would take place by-and-by when the sun to him, speaking of the beauty of the Lourdes district and of the down on the same bench, the abbe considerately began talking shoulder, Father Fourcade, despite his gouty leg, hastily drew ran along shouting orders. Removing his hand from Dr. Bonamy's However, there was again a sudden alert, and the station-master station-master in reply to the questions addressed to him. "Ohl it's that Bayonne express which is so late," answered the nime to get the sick people out before the express passes." "Ahl this time it's the white train. Let us hope we shall have signal began to work. Thereupon the station-master resumed: rushed away into the darkness swinging a lantern, whilst a distant should like some information about it. I'm not at ease."

At this moment the telegraph bells rang out and a porter

the priests, the gentlemen, and the officer of dragoons in their was soon waiting there, whilst Father Fourcade, Dr. Bonamy, in darkness. A mass of pillows, mattresses, stretchers, and litters the white train would come in-an unroofed platform plunged ging their little vehicles across the lines to the platform at which spot from all sides, and setting themselves in motion began drag-Suire was already instilling activity. The bearers flocked to the He started off once more and disappeared. Berthaud meanwhile called to Cérard, who was at the head of a squad of bearers, and they both made haste to join their men, into whom Baron turn crossed over in order to witness the removal of the ailing pilgrims. All that they could as yet see, far away in the depths of the black country, was the lantern in front of the engine, looking like a red star which grew larger and larger. Strident whistles pierced the night, then suddenly ceased, and you only heard the panting of the steam and the dull roar of the wheels gradually slackening their speed. Then the cantiele became distinctly audible, the song of Bernadette with the ever-recurring "Aves" of its refrain, which the whole train was chanting in chorus. And at last this train of suffering and faith, this moaning, singing train, thus making its entry into Lourdes, drew up in the station.

The earriage doors were at once opened, the whole throng of healthy pilgrims, and of ailing ones able to walk, alighted, and streamed over the platform. The few gas lamps east but a feeble light on the erowd of poverty-stricken beings elad in faded garments, and encumbered with all sorts of parcels, baskets, valises, and boxes. And amidst all the jostling of this seared flock, which did not know in which direction to turn to find its way out of the station, loud exclamations were heard, the shouts of people calling relatives whom they had lost, mingled with the embraces of others whom relatives or friends had come to meet. One woman declared with beatifical satisfaction, "I have slept well." A priest went off carrying his travelling-bag, after wishing a crippled lady "good luck!" Most of them had the bewildered, weary, yet joyous appearance of people whom an excursion train sets down at some unknown station. And such became the scramble and the confusion in the darkness, that they did not hear the railway employés who grew quite hoarse through shouting "This way! this way!" in their eagerness to clear the platform as soon as possible.

Sister Hyaeinthe had nimbly alighted from her compartment,

Sister Hyacinthe had nimbly alighted from her compartment, leaving the dead man in the charge of Sister Claire des Anges; and, losing her head somewhat, she ran off to the cantine-van in the idea that Ferrand would be able to help her. Fortunately she found Father Fourcade in front of the van and acquainted him with the fatality in a low voice. Repressing a gesture of annoyance, he thereupon ealled Baron Suire, who was passing, and began whispering in his car. The muttering lasted for a few seconds and then the Baron rushed off, and clove his way through the crowd with two bearers earrying a covered litter. In this the man was removed from the carriage as though he were a patient who had simply fainted, the mob of pilgrims paying no further attention to him amidst all the emotion of their arrival. Preceded by the Baron, the bearers carried the corpse into a goods office, where they provisionally lodged it behind some barrels; one of them, a fair-haired little fellow, a general's son, remaining to watch over it.

Meanwhile, after begging Ferrand and Sister Saint-François of and wait for her in the courtyard of the station, near the eserved vehicle which was to take them to the Hospital of Ourady of Dolours, Sister Hyacinthe returned to the railway-arriage and talked of helping her patients to alight before going way. But Marie would not let her touch her. "Not not" said he girl, "do not trouble about me, Sister. I shall remain here he girl, "do not trouble about me, Sister. I shall remain here he last. My father and Abbé Froment have gone to the van to he last. My father and Abbé Froment have gone to the van to of his them, and they will take me away all right, you may be only them.

In the same way M. Sabathier and Brother Isidore did not desire to be moved until the crowd had decreased. Madame de lonquière, who had taken charge of La Grivotte, also promised to see to Madame Vêtu's removal in an ambulance vehicle. And thereupon Sister Hyacinthe decided that she would go off at she took with her both little Sophie Couteau and Elise Bouquet, whose face she very carefully wrapped up. Madame Maze preceded them, whilst Madame Vincent, carrying her little girl, who reded them, whilst Madame Vincent, carrying her little girl, who coded them, whilst Madame Vincent, carrying her little girl, who was unconscious and quite white, struggled through the crowd, was unconscious and quite white, struggled through the crowd, and depositing the child in the Grotto at the flessed ward depositing the child in the Grotto at the Blessed Winderful in the Grotto at the Blessed ward depositing the child in the Grotto at the fleet of the Blessed ward depositing the child in the Grotto at the fleet of the Blessed ward depositing the child in the Grotto at the fleet of the Blessed ward depositing the child in the Grotto at the fleet of the Blessed was and depositing the child in the Grotto at the fleet of the Blessed was an depositing the child in the Grotto at the fleet of the Blessed was an depositing the child in the Grotto at the fleet of the Blessed was an deposition of the crowd and the child in the fleet of the Blessed was an deposition of the crowd and the control of the Blessed was a control of t

Virgin.

The mob was now pressing towards the doorway by which passengers left the station, and to facilitate the egrees of all these people it at last became necessary to open the luggage gates. The employes, at a loss how to take the tickets, held out their caps, which a downpour of the little cards speedily filled. And in the courtyard, a large square courtyard, skirted on three sides by the low buildings of the station, the most extraordinary uproar prevailed amongst all the vehicles of diverse kinds which were there jumbled together. The hotel omnibuses, backed against their large boards—Jesus and Mary, St. Michel, the Rosary, and their large boards—Jesus and Mary, St. Michel, the Rosary, and their large boards—Jesus and Mary, St. Michel, the Rosary, and their large boards—Jesus and Mary, St. Michel, the Rosary, and their large boards—Jesus and Mary, St. Michel, the Rosary, and their large boards—Jesus and Mary, St. Michel, the Rosary, and with their drivers shouting, swearing and cracking their whips—with their drivers shouting, swearing and cracking their whips—with their drivers shouting, swearing and cracking their whips—with their drivers shouting, increased by the obscurity in which the turnult being apparently increased by the obscurity in which the turnult being apparently increased by the obscurity in which the lanterns set brilliant patches of light.

Rain had fallen heavily a few hours previously. Liquid mud splashed up under the hoofs of the horses; the foot passengers sank into it to their ankles. M. Vigneron, whom Madame Vigneron and Madame Chaise were following in a state of distraction, raised Custav, in order to place him in the omnibus from the Hotel of the Apparitions after which he himself and the ladies climbed into the vehicle. Madame Maze, shuddering slightly, climbed into the vehicle. Madame Maze, shuddering slightly, like a delicate tabby who fears to dirty the tips of her paws, made like a delicate tabby who fears to dirty the tips of her paws, made a sign to the driver of an old brougham, got into it, and quickly drove away, after giving as address the Convent of the Blue Sisters. And at last Sister Hyacinthe was able to instal herself with Elise Rouquet and Sophie Conteau in a large char-à-bancs, in which Ferrand and Sisters Saint-François and Claire des Anges were already seated. The drivers whipped up their spirited little horses, and the vehicles went off at a breakneek pace, amidst the shouts of those left behind, and the splashing of the mire.

. In presence of that rushing torrent, Madame Vincent, with her dear little burden in her arms, hesitated to cross over. Bursts of laughter rang out around her every now and then. Ohl what a filthy mess! And at sight of all the mud, the women eaught up their skirts before attempting to pass through it. At last, when the courtyard had somewhat emptied, Madame Vincent herself ventured on her way, all terror lest the mire should make her fall in that black darkness. Then, on reaching a downhill road, she noticed there a number of women of the locality who were on the watch, offering furnished rooms, bed and board, according to the state of the pilgrim's purse.

"Which is the way to the Grotto, madame, if you please?" asked Madame Vincent, addressing one old woman of the party.

Instead of answering the question, however, the other offered her a cheap room. "You won't find anything in the hotels," she said, "they are all full. Perhaps you will be able to eat there, but you certainly won't find a closet even to sleep in."

Eat, sleep, indeed! Had Madame Vincent any thought of such things; she who had left Paris with thirty sous in her pocket, all that remained to her after the expenses she had been put to?

"The way to the Grotto, if you please, madame," she repeated. Among the women who were thus touting for lodgers, there was a tall, well-built girl, dressed like a superior servant, and looking very clean, with carefully tended hands. She glanced at Madame Vineent and slightly shrugged her shoulders. And then, seeing a broad-chested priest with a red face go by, she rushed after him, offered him a furnished room, and continued following him, whispering in his ear.

Another girl, however, at last took pity on Madame Vincent

Another girl, however, at last took pity on Madame Vincent and said to her; "Here, go down this road, and when you get to the bottom, turn to the right and you will reach the Grotto."

Meanwhile, the confusion inside the station continued. The healthy pilgrims and those of the sick who retained the use of their legs could go off, thus, in some measure, clearing the platform; but the others, the more grievously striken sufferers whom it was difficult to get out of the carriages and remove to the hospital, remained waiting. The bearers seemed to become quite bewildered, rushing madly hither and thither with their litters and vehicles, not knowing at what end to set about profusion of work which lay before them.

"This is my friend, Monsieur Cérard de Peyrelongue." made a good journey, I hope?" Then without a pause he added: nised Raymonde, and with a sign of the hand he at once stopped his companion. "Ah! mademoiselle," said he, "how pleased I am to see you! Is Madame de Jonquière quite well? You have am to see you! under a gas jet and to all appearances waiting, in the girl he recog-As Berthaud, followed by Gérard, went along the platform gesticulating, he noticed two ladies and a girl who were standing met one another at Lourdes." acquainted with this gentleman," she said. "We have previously I already have the pleasure of being slightly smiling eyes. iЧО,, Raymonde gazed fixedly at the young man with her clear

Thereupon Cérard, who thought that his cousin Berthaud was

he would not enter into any hasty engagement, contented himself conducting matters too quickly, and was quite resolved that We are waiting for mamma," resumed Raymonde. with bowing in a ceremonious way.

ing out like brasiers. those magnificent eyes of hers, usually bedimmed, but now shinwhilst Madame Volmar, silent, shrinking back as though taking no interest in it at all, seened simply desirous of penetrating the darkness, as though indeed she were seeking somebody with right for refusing her services. She herself was stamping with impatience, eager to join in the work and make herself useful, right for retusing her services. wayy-haired head, began to say that it served Madame de Jonquière At this, little Madame Désagneaux, with her pretty, light, extremely busy; she has to see after some pilgrims who are very ill."

Dieulafay was being removed from her first-class compartment, and Madante Desagneaux could not restrain an exclamation of Just then, however, they were all pushed back.

"An the poor woman!"

less they have brought a magnificent gift, a golden lantern for the tervently enough to obtain the compassion of Heaven. Meverthein the Blessed Virgin's eyes, and I hope that I have myself prayed rer's cure. I told them that prayer was the most precious thing tue boot beobje, if they could only purchase their dear suffe-. she did not seem to hear. Then as he watched her removal, he resumed, addressing himself to Berthaud, whom he knew: "Ahl her and wished her au revoir, adding some kind words which sufferers; and when two men at last took her up he bent over telegram was in the courtyard. Abbe Judaine also helped the the valises to ascertain if the carriage which had been ordered by standing near her, whilst a manservant and maid ran off with husband and her sister, both very elegant and very sad, remained spred, deposited on that platform till it could be taken away. species of coffin, so wasted that she seemed to be a mere human young woman, encompassed by luxury, covered with lace in her There could in fact be no more distressing sight than this Basilica, a perfect marvel, adorned with precious stones. May the Immaculate Virgin deign to smile upon it!

In this way a great many offerings were brought by the pilgrims. Some huge bouquets of flowers had just gone by, together with a kind of triple crown of roses, mounted on a wooden stand. And the old priest explained that before leaving the station he wished to scenre a banner, the gift of the beautiful Madame Jousseur, Madame Diculatay's sister.

Madame de Jonquière was at last approaching, however, and on perceiving Berthaud and Gérard she exclaimed: "Pray do go to that carriage, gentlemen-that one, there! We want some men very badly. There are three or four sick persons to be taken unt.

I am in despair; I can do nothing myself."

Gérard ran off after bowing to Raymonde, whilst Berthand advised Madame de Jonquière to leave the station with her daughter and those ladies instead of remaining on the platform. Her presence was in nowise necessary, he said; he would undertake everything, and within three-quarters of an hour she would find her patients in her ward at the hospital. She ended by giving way, and took a conveyance in company with Raymonde and Madame Désigneaux. As for Madame Volmar, she had at the last moment disappeared, as though seized with a sudden fit of impatience. The others fancied that they had seen her approach a strange gentleman with the object no doubt of making some inquiry of hun. However, they would of course find her at the hospital.

Berthand joined Gérard again just as the young man, assisted by two fellow-bearers, was endeavouring to remove M. Sabathier . from the carriage. It was a difficult task, for he was very stout and very heavy, and they began to think that he would never pass through the doorway of the compartment. However, as he had been got in they ought to be able to get him out; and indeed when two other bearers had entered the carriage from the other side, they were at last able to deposit him on the platform,

The dawn was now appearing, a faint pale dawn; and the platform presented the wooful appearance of an improvised ambulance. La Grivotte, who had lost consciousness, lay there en a mattress pending her removal in a litter, whilst Madame Vetu had been seated against a lamp-post, suffering so severely from another attack of her ailment that they scarcely dared to touch her. Some hospitallers, whose hands were gloved, were with difficulty wheel-ing their little vehicles in which were poor, sordid-looking women with old baskets at their feet. Others, with stretchers on which lay the stiffened, wooful bedies of silent sufferers, whose eyes gleamed with anguish, found themselves unable to pass; but some of the infirm pilgrims, some unfortunate cripples, contrived to slip through the tanks, among them a young priest who was lame, and a little humphacked boy, one of whose legs had been amputated, feet hanging downward. It seemed as though hours would be a point that he had to be carried on a chair with his head and around a man who was bent in half, twisted by paralysis to such centenes from group to group. Then there was quite a block and who, looking like a gnome, managed to drag himself with lus suddenly rushed up shouting: "The Bayonne express is signalled. Make hastel make hastel You have only three minutes left!"

The dismay theretore reached a climax when the station-master required to clear the platform.

throng, leaning on Doctor Bonamy's arm, and gaily encouraging Father Fourcade, who had remained in the midst of the the more stricken of the sufferers, beckoned to Berthaud and said to him; "Finish taking them out of the train; you will be able to clear the platform afterwards!"

for the crowd which hampered him. fast, and then Pierre might have rolled Marie away had it not been · However, they soon placed it on the wheels and made the latter haste removed the girl from the train. She was as light as a poor shivering bird, and it was only the box that gave them any trouble. lay was rolled about. And with Cérard's assistance Pierre in all the two pairs of wheels by means of which the box in which she M. de Gucrsaint and Pierre had at last returned to her, bringing Jonquière's carriage Marie now alone remained, waiting patiently. finished placing the sufferers on the platform. In Madame de The advice was very sensible, and in accordance with it they

the other hand the express, signalled by the incessant tinkling of was impossible to think of touching her at that moment. But on terrible nervous attack. She was howling and struggling, and it still remained one woman who had just been overpowered by a edge of the platform. In a second-class carriage, however, there And he also pushed the little handearts back, so as to clear the He himself lent a hand, taking hold of a sick man by the fect in order that he might more speedily be got out of a compartment.

"Make hastel make hastel" furiously repeated the station-master.

suffering woman, whom it had been necessary to leave in it, in it went off to the siding the crowd still licard the crics of the convey its load of sick and healthy passengers back to Paris. As it would remain for three days, until in fact it was required to close the door and in all haste shant the train to the siding where the electric bells, was now fast approaching, and they had to

In fact the Bayonne express was now coming along at full speed, 'Cood Lordl' muttered the station-master; "it was high time!" those of a strengthless child, whom one at last succeeds in consothe charge of a Sister, cries which grew weaker and weaker like woeful platform littered with all the grievous wreteliedness of a hospital hastily evacuated. The litters and little handand the next moment it rushed like a crash of thunder past that shaken, but there was no accident, for the porters were on the watch, and pushed from the line the bewildered flock which was still jostling and struggling in its eagerness to get away. As soon as the express had passed, however, circulation was re-established, and the bearers were at last able to complete the removal of the sick with prudent deliberation.

Little by little the daylight was increasing—a clear dawn it was, whitening the heavens, whose reflection illumined the earth, which was still black. You began to distinguish things and people clearly.

"Oh, by-and-by!" Marie repeated to Pierre, as he endeavoured to roll her away. "Let us wait till some part of the crowd has gone."

Then, looking around, she began to feel interested in a man of military bearing, apparently some sixty years of age, who was walking about among the sick pilgrims. With a square-shaped head and white bushy hair, he would still have looked sturdy if he had not dragged his left foot, throwing it inward at each step he took. With the left hand, too, he leant heavily on a thick walking-stick. When M. Sabathier, who had visited Lourdes for six years past, perceived him he became quite gay. "Ah!" said he. "it is you, Commander!"

Commander was perhaps the old man's name. But as he was decorated with a broad red riband, he was possibly called Commander on account of his decoration, albeit the latter was that of a mere chevalier. Nobody exactly knew his story. No doubt he had relatives and children of his own somewhere, but these matters remained vague and mysterious. For the last three years he had been employed at the railway-station as a superintendent in the goods department, a simple occupation, a little berth which had been given him by favour and which enabled him to live in perfect happiness. A first stroke of apoplexy at fifty-five years of age had heen followed by a second one three years later, which had left him slightly paralysed in the left side. And now he was awaiting the third stroke with an air of perfect tranquillity. As he himself put it, he was at the disposal of death, which might come for him that night, the next day, or possibly that very moment. All Lourdes knew him on account of the habit, the mania he had, at pilgrimage time, of coming to witness the arrival of the trains, dragging his foot along and leaning upon his stick, whilst expressing his astonichment and reproaching the ailing ones for their intense desire to be made whole and sound again.

This was the third year that he had seen M. Sabathier arrive, and all his anger fell upon him. "What! you have come back again!" he exclaimed. "Well, you must be desirous of living this hateful life! But sacrebleu! go and die quietly in your bed at home.

Isn't that the best thing that can happen to any one?"

M. Sabathier evinced no anger, but laughed, exhausted though he was by the handling to which he had been subjected during his removal from the carriage. "No, no," said he, "I prefer to be every suffering again. Come, monsieur, you would be nicely pain, and all this to be cured-to go through every worry and travel hundreds of leagues and arrive in fragments, howling with "To be cured, to be cured. That's what they all ask for. They cured."

like that! Death is happiness!" few years more? It's much better to die at once, while you are would you find in prolonging the abomination of old age for a What would you do with them, mon Dieu? What pleasure caught if, at your age and with your dilapidated old body, your Blessed Virgin should be pleased to restore the use of your legs to delicious reward of eternal life, but as a weary man who expects He spoke in this fashion, not as a believer who aspires to the

no more. to fall into nihility, to enjoy the great everlasting peace of being acquainted. might gently scold the Commander, with whom he also was well he had a child to deal with, Abbé Judaine, who had at last secured his banner, came by and stopped for a moment in order that he Whilst M. Sabathier was gaily shrugging his shoulders as though

Virgin to cure your leg before now. against God to refuse life and to treat health with contempt. Don't blaspheme, my dear friend," he said. "It is an offence your face to the wall and you die-it's simple enough." may it all be over for ever! When the time comes to die you turn can do nothing to itl I'm quite at my ease. May death come and tell all our sick to go home and die-even mademoiselle, eh? She The old priest interrupted him, however. Pointing to Marie, who was lying on her box listening to them, he exclaimed: "You who is full of youth and wishes to live."

At this the Commander became angry. "My legi The Virgin

that she be happy." seized with deep emotion which made his voice tremble. "If madennoiselle gets well," he said, "I will wish her another miracle, the base of the contract of th Commander, who had drawn near, gazed upon her, suddenly Marie's eyes were wide open, burning with the ardent desire which she felt to be, to enjoy her share of the vast world; and the

with the ferrule of his stout stick as he continued wending his way, Then he went off, dragging his foot and tapping the flagstones

one to arrive. Of all the ailing pilgrims the only one p began giving orders for the green train, which would y like an angry philosopher, among the suffering pilgrims.

Little by little, the platform was at last cleared. Madame Vetu and La Grivotte were carried away, and Gerard removed M. Sabathier in a little cart, whilst Baron Suire and Berthau dy and La Grivotte for the cart, whilst Baron Suire and Berthau. ing at the station was Marie, of whom Pierre jealously took charge. He had already dragged her into the courtyard when he noticed that M. de Guersaint had disappeared; but a moment later he perceived him conversing with the Abbé Des Hermoises, whose acquaintance he had just made. Their admiration of the beauties of nature had brought them together. The daylight had now appeared, and the surrounding mountains displayed themselves in all their majesty.

"What a lovely country, monsieurl" exclaimed M. de Guersaint. "I have been wishing to see the Cirque de Gavarnie for thirty years past. But it is some distance away and the trip must be an expensive one, so that I fear I shall not be able to make it.'

"You are mistaken, monsieur," said the Abbé; "nothing is more easily managed. By making up a party the expense becomes very slight. And as it happens, I wish to return there this year, so that . if you would like to join us--"

"Oh, certainly, monsieur. We will speak of it again. A thousand thanks," replied M. de Guersaint.

His daughter was now ealling him however, and he joined her after taking leave of the Abbé in a very cordial manner. Pierre had decided that he would drag Marie to the Hospital so as to · spare her the pain of transference to another vehicle. But as the omnibuses, landaus, and other conveyances were already coming back, again filling the courtyard in readiness for the arrival of the next train, the young priest had some difficulty in reaching the road with the little chariot, whose low wheels sank deeply in the mud. Some police agents charged with maintaining order were eursing that fearful mire which splashed their boots; and indeed it was only the touts, the young and old women who had rooms to let, who laughed at the puddles, which they crossed and crossed again in every direction, pursuing the last pilgrims that emerged from the station.

When the little car had begun to roll more easily over the sloping road Marie suddenly inquired of M. de Guersaint, who was walking near her: "What day of the week is it, father?"

"Saturday, my darling."

"Ahl yes, Saturday, the day of the Blessed Virgin. Is it to-day that she will cure me?"

Then she began thinking again; while, at some distance behind her, two bearers came furtively down the road, with a covered stretcher in which lay the corpse of the man who had died in the train. They had gone to take it from behind the barrels in the goods office, and were now conveying it to a secret spot of which Father Fourcade had told them.

HOSPITAL AND GROTTO п

latter institution, hospital, the men being sent to the former and the women to the to be distributed between the Hospital of Salvation and the town so that the three or four hundred remaining sufferers have it as many as five and six hundred patients. Still, however is let to the Fathers of the Assumption, who at times lodge in old folks are for three days sheltered elsewhere, and the hospital aged paupers; but at the season of the national pilgrimage these lofty, since it is difficult to earry the sufferers to the topmost wards. As a rule the building is occupied by a hundred infirm and Burr, so far as it extends, by a charitable Canon, and left unfinished through lack of money, the Hospital of Our Lady of Dolours is a vast pile, four storeys high, and consequently far too assistants and the young seminarists who acted as the scorctary's over again, the same woeful camping in the open, whilst the thing like an orderly manner. It was the unpacking of the station to wait there until it became possible to admit them in somethe patients had to be deposited in the courtyard as they arrived, Lourdes, and the new formalities so complicated matters that torrent of ailing beings which the white train had brought to to act in accordance with these good intentions in presence of the or a ward and the number of a bed. It became difficult, however, and distributing the admission eards, each of which bore the name occurred in the past, very great care was to be taken in filling in prevent a repetition of the cases of mistaken identity which had time to be reserved to the most helpless sufferers; and in order to organisation of the preceding year. The lower wards were this The managers were desirous of greatly improving upon the had installed itself in one of the ground-floor rooms on the previous a couple of priests were mounting guard. The temporary staff, with its formidable supply of registers, cards, and printed formulas, covered courtyard of Our Lady of Dolours, at the door of which That morning at sunrise great confusion prevailed in the sand-that, by some inexplicable error, they had allotted not the but the higher placed wards to the patients whom it was number of uscless precautions been taken, and they now discove There was much truth in his remark, for never had a greater well!" exclaimed Baron Suire in despair.

"We have been over-ambitious, we wanted to do things too difficult to move. It was impossible to begin the classification afresh, however, and so, as in former years, things must be allowed to take their course, in a haphazard way. The distribution of the eards began, a young priest at the same time entering each patient's name and address in a register. Moreover, all the hospitalisation eards bearing the patients' names and numbers had to be produced, so that the names of the wards and the numbers of the beds might be added to them; and all these formalities greatly protracted the défilé.

Then there was endless coming and going from the top to the bottom of the building, and from one to the other end of each of its four floors. M. Sabathier was one of the first to secure admittance, being placed in a ground-floor room which was known as the Family Ward. Siek men were there allowed to have their wives with them; but to the other wards of the hospital only women were admitted. Brother Isidore, it is true, was accompanied by his sister; however, by a special favour it was agreed that they should be considered as conjoints, and the missionary was accordingly placed in the bed next to that allotted to M. Sabathier. The chapel, still littered with plaster and with its unfinished windows boarded up, was close at hand. There were also various wards in an unfinished state; still these were filled with mattresses, on which sufferers were rapidly placed. All those who could walk, however, were already besieging the refectory, a long gallery whose broad windows looked into an inner courtyard; and the Saint-Frai Sisters, who managed the hospital at other times, and had remained to attend to the cooking, began to distribute bowls of coffee and checolate among the poor women whom the terrible journey had exhausted.

poor women whom the terrible journey had exhausted.

"Rest yourselves and try to gain a little strength," repeated Baron Suire, who was ever on the move, showing himself here, there, and everywhere in rapid succession. "You have three good hours before you, it is not yet five, and their reverences have given orders that you are not to be taken to the Grotto until eight o'clock, so as to avoid any excessive fatigue.

Meanwhile, up above on the second floor, Madame de Jonquière had been one of the first to take possession of the Sainte-Honorine Ward, of which she was the superintendent. She had been obliged to leave her daughter Raymonde downstairs, for the regulations did not allow young girls to enter the wards where they might have witnessed sights that were scarcely proper or else far too horrible for such eyes as theirs. Raymonde had therefore remained in the refectory as a helper, but little Madame Désagneaux, in her capacity as a lady-hospitaller, had not left the superintendent, and was already asking her for orders in her delight that she should at last be able to render some assistance.

"Are all these beds properly made, madame?" she inquired; "perhaps I lad better make them afresh with Sister Hyacinthe."

lew windows admitted but little light from an inner yard, contain-. The ward, whose walls were painted a light yellow, and whose

I must accommodate twenty-three patients. We shall have to put an undertone: "I shall never have room enough. They say that ed fifteen beds, standing in two rows against the walls. "We will see by-and-by," replied Madame de Jonquière with an absorbed air. She was busy counting the beds and examining the long narrow apartment. And this accomplished she added in place some of them between the beds at once. attended to things themselves. The reserve mattresses are in the One can see that the Saint-Frai Sisters have is very elean too. promptly reassured Madame Désagneaux with regard to her surmises; "Ohl the beds are properly made," she said, "everything began to lift up the coverlets and examine the bedding. And she ing apartment which was being transformed into a linen-room, then Sister Saint-François and Sister Claire des Anges in a small adjoin-Sister Hyaeinthe, who had followed the ladies after leaving excited by the idea of carrying mattresses with her weak slender "Oh, certainly!" exelaimed young Madame Désagneaux, quite

some mattresses dovn."

It became necessary for Madame de Jonquière to calm her.

tomed. And thus they emerged from it aehing all over, tired and overwhelming labour to which they were in no wise accusturned the sufferers over in their beds, went through a siekening terrible and repugnant speetacles. They witnessed the death agonics, dressed the pestilential sores, eleaned up, changed linen, They witnessed the death a couple of hours each night and living in the midst of the most for they underwent five days of awful fatigue, sleeping searcely jedged that those who devoted themselves were really deserving, cursions as soon as they reached Lourdes. Still it must be acknowvilege of wearing the red cloth cross, and who started off on exwere some among them who cared for nothing beyond the priof the lady-hospitallers increased year by year. Fortunately there lest they might cheek the flow of almsgiving. Thus the number There were more than two hundred of them, and as each had to make a donation on joining the Hospitality of Our Lady of Salvation, the managers did not dare to refuse any applicants, for fear number of nurses, women of the aristocracy and upper middle class, with whose fervent zeal some little vanity was blended. which so often arose was, in fact, increased by the execssive The confusion of busy decs, all eager to start on their work, Some other lady-hospitallers were now arriving, quite a hiveful the first floor. However, we will organise matters, all the same," it is so difficult to air. Last year I had the Lainte-Rosalie Ward on Let us wait till our patients arrive. I don't much like this ward, "By-and-by," said the lady-superintendent; "there is no hurry. difficult to move. It was impossible to begin the classification afresh, however, and so, as in former years, things must be allowed to take their course, in a haphazard way. The distribution of the cards began, a young priest at the same time entering each patient's name and address in a register. Moreover, all the hospitalisation cards bearing the patients' names and numbers had to be produced, so that the names of the wards and the numbers of the beds might be added to them; and all these formalities

greatly protracted the défilé.

Then there was endless coming and going from the top to the bottom of the building, and from one to the other end of each of its four floors. M. Sabathier was one of the first to secure admittance, being placed in a ground-floor room which was known as the Family Ward. Siek men were there allowed to have their wives with them; but to the other wards of the hospital only women were admitted. Brother Isidore, it is true, was accompanied by his sister; however, by a special favour it was agreed that they should be considered as conjoints, and the missionary was accordingly placed in the bed next to that allotted to M. Sabathier. The chapel, still littered with plaster and with its unfinished windows boarded up, was close at hand. There were also various wards in an unfinished state; still these were filled with mattresses, on which sufferers were rapidly placed. All those who could walk, however, were already besieging the refectory, a long gallery whose broad windows looked into an inner courtyard; and the Saint-Frai Sisters, who managed the hospital at other times, and had remained to attend to the cooking, began to distribute bowls of coffee and chocolate among the poor women whom the terrible journey had exhausted.

"We will see by-and-by," replied Madame de Jonquière with an absorbed air. She was busy counting the beds and examining ed fifteen beds, standing in two rows against the walls. Lew windows admitted but little light from an inner yard, contain-The ward, whose walls were painted a light yellow, and whose

I must accommodate twenty-three patients. We shall have to put They say that an, undertone: "I shall never have room enough, the long narrow spartment. And this accomplished she added in attended to things themselves. The reserve mattresses are in the next room, however, and if madame will lend me a hand we can is very clean too. One can see that the Saint-Frai Sisters have promptly reassured Madame Désagneaux with regard to her surmises: "Ohl the beds are properly made," she said, "everything began to lift up the coverlets and examine the bedding. And she ing apartment which was being transformed into a linen-room, then Sister Saint-François and Sister Claire des Anges in a sinall adjoin-Sister Hyacinthe, who had followed the ladies after leaving some mattresses down,"

"Oh, certainly!" exclaimed young Madame Désagneaux, quite excited by the idea of carrying mattresses with her weak slender place some of them between the beds at once,

It became necessary for Madame de Jonquière to calm her. "By-and-by," said the lady-superintendent; 'there is no lurry.

Let us wait till our patients arrive. I don't much like this ward,

There were more than two hundred of them, and as each had to number of nurses, women of the aristoeracy and upper middle class, with whose fervent zeal some little vanity was blended. which so often arose was, in fact, increased by the excessive Some other lady-hospitallers were now arriving, quite a hivoful of busy bees, all eager to start on their work. The confusion the first floor. However, we will organise matters, all the same," it is so difficult to air. Last year, I had the Sainte-Rosalie Ward on ledged that those who devoted themselves were really deserving, cursions as soon as they reached Lourdes. Still it must be acknowvilege of wearing the red cloth cross, and who started off on exwere some among them who eared for nothing beyond the priof the lady-hospitallers increased year by year. Fortunately there lest they might check the flow of almsgiving. Thus the number tion, the managers did not dare to refuse any applicants, for fear make a donation on joining the Hospitality of Our Lady of Salva-

for they underwent five days of awful fatigue, sleeping scarcely a couple of hours each night and living in the midst of the most terrible and repugnant spectacles. They witnessed the death agonies, dressed the pestilential sores, cleaned up, changed linen, tomed. And thus they emerged from it aching all over, tired and overwhelming labour to which they were in no wise accusturned the sufferers over in their beds, went through a siekening to death, with feverish eyes flaming with the joy of the charity which so excited them.

"And Madame Volmar?" suddenly asked Madame Désagneaux.

"I thought we should find her here."

This was apparently a subject which Madame de Jonquière did not eare to have discussed; for, as though she were aware of the truth and wished to bury it in silence, with the indulgence of a woman who compassionates human wretchedness, she promptly retorted: "Madame Volmar isn't strong, she must have gone to the hotel to rest. We must let her sleep."

Then she apportioned the beds among the ladies present, allotting two to each of them; and this done they all finished taking possession of the place, hastening up and down and backwards and forwards in order to ascertain where the offices, the linen-room, and the kitchens were situated.

"And the dispensary?" then asked one of the ladies.

But there was no dispensary. There was no medical staff even. What would have been the use of any?—since the patients were those whom science had given up, despairing creatures who had come to beg of God the cure which powerless men were unable to promise them. Logically enough, all treatment was suspended during the pilgrimage. If a patient seemed likely to die, extreme unction was administered. The only medical man about the place was the young doctor who had come by the white train with his little medicine-chest; and his intervention was limited to an endeavour to assuage the sufferings of those patients who chanced to ask for him during an attack.

As it happened, Sister Hyaeinthe was just bringing Ferrand, whom Sister Saint-François had kept with her in a closet near the linen-room which he proposed to make his quarters. "Madame," said he to Madame de Jonquière, "I am entirely at your disposal. In case of need you will only have to ring for me."

your disposal. In case of need you will only have to ring for me."

She barely listened to him, however, engaged as she was in a quarrel with a young priest belonging to the management with reference to a deficiency of certain utensils. "Certainly, monsieur, if we should need a soothing draught," she answered, and their reverting to her discussion, she went on: "Well, Monsieur l'Abbé, you must certainly get me four or five more. How can we possibly manage with so few? Things are bad enough as it is."

Ferrand looked and listened, quite bewildered by the extraordinary behaviour of the people amongst whom he had been thrown by chance since the previous day. He who did not believe, who was only present out of friendship and charity, was amazed at this extraordinary scramble of wretchedness and suffering rushing towards the hope of happiness. And, as a medical man of the new school, he was altogether upset by the careless neglect of precautions, the contempt which was shown for the most simple teachings of science, in the certainty which was three hours before you. We will put you to bed. It will ease you to take you out of that ease."

Thereupon the lady-superintendent raised her by the shoulders, whilst Sister Hyacinthe held her feet. The bed was in the central part of the ward, near a window. For a moment the poor girl remained on it with her eyes closed, as though exhausted by being moved about so much. Then it became necessary, that Pierre should be readmitted for she grew very fidgety, saying that there were things which she must explain to him.

"Pray don't go away, my friend," she exclaimed when he approached her. "Take the case out on to the landing, but stay there, because I want to be taken down as soon as I can get permission."

"Do you feel more comfortable now?" asked the young priest.
"Yes, no doubt—but I really don't know. I so much want to be taken yonder, to the Blessed Virgin's feet.'

However, when Pierre had removed the ease, the successive arrivals of the other patients supplied her with some little diversion. Madame Vêtu, whom two bearers had brought upstairs, holding her under the arms, was laid, fully dressed, on the next bed, where she remained motionless, scarcely breathing, with her heavy, yellow, cancerous mask. None of the patients, it should be mentioned, were divested of their clothes, they were simply stretched out on the beds, and advised to go to sleep if they could manage to do so. Those whose complaints were less grievous contented themselves with sitting down on their mattresses, chatting together, and putting the things they had brought with them in order. For instance, Elise Rouquet, who was also near Marie, on the other side of the latter's bed, opened her basket to take a elean fiehu out of it, and seemed sorely annoyed at having no hand-glass with her. In less than ten minutes all the beds were occupied, so that when La Grivotte appeared, half earried by Sister Hyacinthe and Sister Claire des Anges, it became necessary to place some mattresses on the floor.

"Here! here is one," exclaimed Madame Désagneaux; "she wi

be very well here, out of the draught from the door."

Seven other mattresses were soon added in a line, oecupyin the space between the rows of beds, so that it became difficult is move about. One had to be very careful, and follow narro pathways which had been left between the beds and the mattre ses. Each of the patients had retained possession of her pare or box, or bag, and round about the improvised shakedowns we piles of poor old things, sorry remnants of garments, straying among the sheets and the coverlets. You might have thoug yourself in some woeful ambulance, hastily organised after song great catastrophe, some conflagration or carthquake which I thrown hundreds of wounded and penniless beings into the strey Madame de Jonquière made her way from one to the other of excite yourselves; try to sleep a little," of the ward, ever and ever repeating, "Come, my children, don't and then by another, dear as she was to all alike for the miraculous Sisters, and was very gay, imagined that it was playtime, and ran, and jumped, and hopped in turn, called and petted first by one frightful scramble little Sophie Couteau, who remained with the And meanwhile, let loose amidst this which nobody executed, late amidst the calls, the answers, and the contradictory orders in better health asked for broth, bowlsful of which began to circu-Those patients who were distressed by the unbearable odour, all her passionate courage she almost fainted, so greatly was she took to dress her sore afresh; but she was not skilful, and despite leg, began moaning so dreadfully that Madame Désagneaux underto be attended to. One woman, suffering from an ulcer in the of several patients had to be changed, and there were other needs However, she did not succeed in calming them, and indeed, she her other lady-hospitallers under her orders, increased the general fever by her own bewilderment. The linen unoccupied altar at which he might say his mass had delayed his of the Sainte-Honorine Ward, and only the difficulty of finding an had just struck when Abbe Judaine came in. He was the chaplain However, amidst this agitation, the hours went by, Seven o'clock hope which she brought them,

As soon as he appeared, a cry of impatience arose from arrival.

"Oh! Monsicur le Curé, let us start, let us start at once!" every bed.

also was returning to her livid face. She was already resuscitat-And colour for the happy moment when she would be removed, turning her dark glances in all directions, waiting and watching self ereet? Incrt and fainting on her arrival, she was now seated, power, this teverish desire for cure which enabled her to set herbeginning of the miracle in this-in this awakening of her will siting upon her mattress- and joining her hands, begged and begged that she might be taken to the Grotto. Was there not a ged that she might be taken to the Crotto. appease. And more fervently than any of the others La Grivotte, thirst, which only the waters of the miraculous fountain could irritated, was upbuoying them, like a more and more devouring An ardent desire, which each passing minute heightened and that I shall be eured," she exclaimed. "Ohl Monsieur le Curé, pray do tell them to take me-I feel those who behaved themselves the best. she bided her time, and distributed her divine favours among sides, the Blessed Virgin did not like to have violence done her; able, and allow sufficient time for things to be organised; and be-They would soon set out; but they must be reasonkind words. Judaine listened to them all, and allayed their impatience with With a loving, fatherly smile on his good-natured face, Abbe

As he paused before Marie's bed and beheld her, stammering entreaties with joined hands, he again paused. "And you, too, my daughter, you are in a hurry?" he said, "Be easy, there is grace enough in heaven for you all."

"I am dying of love, father," she murmured in reply. "My heart is so swollen with prayers, it stilles me—"

He was greatly touched by the passion of this poor emaciated ehild, so harshly stricken in her youth and beauty, and wishing to appease her, he called her attention to Madame Vêtu, who did not move, though with her eyes wide open she stared at all who passed.

'Look at madame, how quiet she isl" he said. She is meditating, and she does right to place herself in God's hands, like a little

However, in a scarcely audible voice, a mere breath, Madame

Vêtu stammered: "Oh! I am suffering, I am suffering."

At last, at a quarter to eight o'clock, Madame de Jonquière warned her charges that they would do well to prepare themselves. She herself, assisted by Sister Hyacinthe and Madame Désagneaux, buttoned several dresses, and put shoes on impotent feet. It was a real toilette, for they all desired to appear to the greatest advantage before the Blessed Virgin. A large number had sufficient sense of delieacy to wash their hands. Others unpacked their parcels, and put on clean linen. On her side, Elise Rouquet had ended by discovering a little pocket-glass in the hands of a woman near her, a huge, dropsical creature, who was very coquettish; and having borrowed it, she leant it against the bolster, and then, with infinite care, began to fasten her fichu as elegantly as possible about her head, in order to hide her distorted features. Mean-while, creet in front of her, little Sophic watched her with an air of profound interest.

It was Abbé Judaine who gave the signal for starting on the journey to the Grotto. He wished, he said, to accompany his dear suffering daughters thither, whilst the lady-hospitallers and the Sisters remained in the ward, so as to put things in some little order again. Then the ward was at once emptied, the patients being carried downstairs amidst renewed tumult. And Pierre having replaced Marie's box upon its wheels, took the first place in the cortège which was formed of a score of little hand-earts, bathchairs, and litters. The other wards, however, were also emptying, the courtyard became erowded, and the defile was organised in haphazard fashion. There was soon an interminable train descending the rather steep slope of the Avenue de la Grotte, so that Pierre was already reaching the Plateau de la Merlasse when the last stretchers were barely leaving the precincts of the hospital.

It was eight o'clock, and the sun, already high, a triumphant August sun, was flaming in the great sky, which was beautifully elear. It seemed as if the blue of the atmosphere, cleansed by the

the control of the co more went by, there was always armething more frightly to train. but seem this bod. angre risis betautich doldy emonth off devoured by cancers, while acted to be listening to the thirty with the painted study and elift dough secured blacky of his monow plexions and slender needs emen nayly by some, and yellow faced Afterwards came from Erchitic gight displaying where their Ashirote and mong Albaria graiting that he lied to thought these was one whose मध्ये के किया है हैं हैं है कि किया है किया है कि किया है किया है है है or poor creatures whom nature had warred and bioken and among sion-twisted trunks, twisted arms, necks gekey, all the distribute ed. Then every deformity of the contractions followed in sours: looked indeed like a death's head in which a touch had been light. one smood them who was quite while, with thinking the white earth in which they would soon be laid to nest and there was wasted to skeletons, with livid skins, recalling the coloni of that right cheek, which she seemed to throw forward, there thoughty, consumptives, trembling with fever, exhausted by dysorbry, den, convulsive grinnees. A younger one, who followed have the the about a kind of plaintive animal cry, each thin that the dent to a back, a kind of plaintive animal cry, each thin that the gause, the left side of her face behay confinally illituited by suchher head Despeading her grievens malady. A tall khil afflichel with a chorea-St. Vitus s dance-was dancing with every limb, within it ing from hydrocephalus, sat he a thtle cart, the dolorgual method of looking, in fact, like bags stuffed foll of rage, Our wonan, sufferothers protruded feet swollen by admin hoyond all numentalitim, some stretchers dangled hands twisted by thounnithm, with trun Then eame the dropsied ones, infined like wine-aking mid inglike with impediginous lichen like a tree which has rotted in the shade, array of doleful vigit affected with legicist, mother was correct gathered together. Eczenna, roscola, elophanihala prosented a long dies, the rare and awful cases which proyohe a shudder had heep like the clearing of some inferm where the most montained minh observed, ailments of all kinds were lamided togothers it seemed that radiant morning. There was no end to the train of abound that radions, it appeared to grow longer and longer. No order was woe, rolled along the sloping parement unid all the bulllance of thuce they previous night, were quite new, first all to terrors of human of trighten depicts a perfect Cour des Misquelles of human. ments, laughed aloud with a terrifying laugh. And all at once an epileptic was seized with convulsions, and began foaming on her stretcher, without, however, causing any stoppage of the procession, which never slackened its march, lashed onward as it was by the blizzard of feverish passion which impelled it towards the Grotto.

The bearers, the priests, and the ailing ones themselves had just intonated a canticle, the song of Bernadette, and all rolled along amid the besetting "Aves," so that the little carts, the litters, and the pedestrians descended the sloping road like a swollen and overflowing torrent of roaring water. At the corner of the Rue Saint-Joseph, near the Plateau de la Merlasse, a family of excursionists, who had come from Cauterets or Bugnères, stood at the edge of the footway overcome with profound astonishment. These people were evidently well-to-do bourgeois, the father and mother very correct in appearance and demeanour, while their two big girls, attired in light-coloured dresses, had the smiling faces of happy ereatures who are amusing themselves. But their first feeling of surprise was soon followed by terror, a growing terror, as if they here beheld the opening of some pesthouse of ancient times, some hospital of the legendary ages, evacuated after a great epidemic. The two guls at last became quite pale, while the father and the mother felt icy cold in presence of that endless défié of so many horrors, the pestilential emanations of which were blown full in their taces. O God! to think that such hideousness, such filth, such suffering, should exist! Was it possible-under that magnificently radiant sun, under those broad heavens so full of light and joy, wither the freshness of the Gave's waters ascended, and the breeze of morning wafted the pure perfumes of the mountainsl

When Pierre, at the head of the cortege, reached the Plateau de la Merlasse, he tound himself immersed in that clear sunlight, that fresh and balmy air. He turned round and smiled affectionately at Marie; and as they came out on the Place du Rosaire in the morning splendour, they were both enchanted with the lovely panorama which spread around them.

In front, on the east, was Old Lourdes, lying in a broad fold of the ground beyond a rock. The sun was rising behind the distant mountains, and its oblique rays clearly outlined the dark lilac mass of that solitary rock, which was crowned by the tower and crumbling walls of the ancient castle, once the redoubtable key of the seven valleys. Through the dancing, golden dust you discerned little of the ruined pile except some stately outlines, some huge blocks of building which looked as though reared by Cyclopean hands; and beyond the rock you but vaguely distinguished the discoloured, intermingled house-roofs of the old town. Nearer in than the castle, however, the new town-the rich and noisy city which had sprung up in a few years as though by miracle-spread out on either hand, displaying its hotels, its stylish shops, its lodging-houses all with snow-white fronts smiling amidst patches of in the projected shade that bathed them, assumed delicate tints Gers arose, two huge ridges of bare rock and low herbage, which, ery, this gay, seattered, rejuvenated town, the little and the big background to this delightful picture, this fresh water, this greenthe railway station and the recently opened Boulevard. And as a maculate Conception had built in order to connect the Crotto with as they careered under the new one, which the Fathers of the Imnow deep as they passed under the old bridge, and now green, greenery. Then there was the Gave flowing along at the base of the the establishment of the Sisters of the Immaculate Conception, roofs, sequestered in the far-away solitude. And at last appeared then that of the Assumptionists higher up, skirting the road to Poucyferre; whilst the Dominicans showed but a corner of their convent, on the highway to Pau, just in front of the Crotto, and buildings shone brightly in the sunlight. Next came the Carmelite an Orphan Asylum founded by the Sisters of Nevers, whose vast imparted some measure of life to the landscape. First, there was have sprung up in this region of prodigies like early vegetation, valleys beyond the Gave, a number of convents, which seemed to the ether. And in the foreground, rising in tiers among the grassy dominated by the Miramont. Other crests, far off, faded away into that side lay Bartrès. More to the left arose the Serre de Julos, ascended, their wooded slopes radiant in the morning light. On the hills followed by the railway line, the heights of Le Buala Then, upon the north, on the right bank of the Cave, beyond of pale mauve and green, tading sottly into pink.

the same silvery strains of joy. The bell of the numery of Saint vents, on the other, the southern horizon, answered them with joyfully in the crystalline atmosphere, whilst the hells of other con-At that early hour all the bells of these convents were pealing · lady pilgrims, desirous of solitude, as boarders.

the far end of the valley a home where they received well-to-do those who were called the Blue Sisters, and who had founded at slopes the sunlight tinged omately with soft blue and camine ing of heights amongst which you noticed those of Usens, whose a commingling of smiling and of agitated nature, an endless surgbetween the ridges, and mountains that upreared their bare sides, on this side of the town, also, there were valleys that dipped down bud a lo anightnish of being fancing of a bid of bidw Clarissa, near the old bridge, rang a scale of gay, clear notes, which snaked between the trees on its way to the Calvary above. dazzing niountain on whose sides one could only discern the road And on this side the background was one of gold and purple, a the large and the little Beout with their cupolas of unequal height. they were quite dazzled. The sun-rays were here streaming on However, when Marie and Pierre turned their eyes to the west, ot a rippling, moire-like effect.

And here, too, against the sunlit background, radiant like an aureola, stood out the three superposed churches which at the voice of Bernadette had sprung from the rock to the glory of the Blessed Virgin. First of all, down below, came the church of the Rosary, squat, circular, and half cut out of the rock, at the farther end of an esplanade on either side of which, like two huge arms, were colossal gradient ways, ascending gently to the Crypt Church. Vast labour had been expended here, a Crypt Clurch. quarryful of stones had been ent and set in position, there were arches as lofty as naves supporting the gigantic terraced avenues which had been constructed so as to allow the processions to roll along in all their pomp, and the little conveyances containing sick children to ascend without hindrance to the divine presence. Then came the Crypt, the subterraneau elurch within the rock, with only its low door visible above the church of the Rosary, whose paved roof, with its vast promenade, formed a continuation of the terraced inclines. And at last, from the summit sprang the Basiliea, somewhat slender and frail, recalling some finely chased jewel of the Renascence, and looking very new and very white-like a prayer, a spotless dove, soaring aloft from the rocks of Massabielle. The spire, which -appeared the more delicate and slight when compared with the gigantic inclines below, seemed like the little vertical flame of a taper set in the midst of the vast landscape, those endless waves of valleys and mountains. By the side, too, of the dense greenery of the Calvary hill, it looked fragile and candid, like childish faith; and at sight of it you instinctively thought of the little white arm, the little thin hand of the puny girl, who had here pointed to Heaven in the crisis of her human sufferings. You could not see the Grotto, the entrance of which was on the left, at the base of the rock. Beyond the Basilica, the only buildings which caught the eye were the heavy square pile where the Fathers of the Immaculate Conception had their abode, and the episcopal palace, standing much farther away, in a spreading, wooded valley. And the three churches were flaming in the morning glow, and the rain of gold scattered by the sun-rays was sweeping the whole countryside, whilst the flying peals of the bells seemed to be the very vibration of the light, the musical awakening of the lovely day that was now beginning.

Whilst crossing the Place du Rosaire, Pierre and-Marie glanced at the Esplanade, the public walk with its long central lawn skirted by broad parallel paths and extending as far as the new bridge. Here, with face turned towards the Basilica, was the great crowned statue of the Virgin. All the sufferers crossed themselves as they went by. And still passionately chanting its canticle, the fearful cortège rolled on, through nature in festive array. Under the dazzling sky, past the mountains of gold and as this nightinare swept before their eyes. passers-by, who stopped short, unable to stir, their hearts frozen wretchedness and pain, amidst all the fright and horror of the nearer to the Crotto it bore that abominable torrent of human the stubborn plaint acquired increased volume, as nearer and mad, and the idiotic. "Ave, ave, ave, Marial" they sang, and rickety, the epileptics, the cancerous, the goitrous, the blind, the twisted into postures of agony. And the victims of hydrocephalus followed, with the dancers of St. Vitus, the consumptives; the like wineskins, and those whom rheumatism and paralysis had condemned, those who were afflicted with skin diseases, those whose flesh was eaten away, those who were dropsical and inflated ever marched on with its sufferers, whom nature, if not God, had running waters whose freshness was eternal, that cortege still and purple, amidst the centenarian trees, symbolical of health, the

Marie, whom Pierre wheeled as near to the railing as possible, was only able to raise herself in her little conveyance, and mur: "O most Blessed Virgin, Virgin most loved!" quary of the Gave, they all at once came upon the Grotto. And Pierre and Marie were the first to pass under the lofty areade of one of the terraced inclines. And then, as they followed the occupied. Her eyes were dazzled by the splendour of the Crotto; or the stone pulpit on her right which Father Massias already. chaplets, statuettes, pictures, and other religious articles were sold. twelve-piped fountain, which she had just passed, nor did she. She had seen neither the entrances to the piscinas nor the the sky, its slight, tapering spire soaring into the azure of the sine once more beheld the slender white Basilica profiled against peen thrown. However, as she raised her eyes above the rock, in the centre near a little portable organ over which a cover had away amidst the ivy and the eglantine, nor even the altar placed of the vault had been covered, nor the piles of bouquets fading nothing existed there, neither the crutches with which a part like cavity. And for her, apart from that glorious apparition, Virgin, which stood, higher up, at the edge of a narrow ogivea furnace and illuminating, as with star rays, the statue of the it seemed to her as if a hundred thousand tapers were burning the low entrace with the glow of

"lenigniV lo "O Virgin most powerful-Queen of the Virgins-Holy Virgin

and little vehicles whose wheels became entangled together, and at down, while the vacant spaces were soon filled with litters these benches were already occupied by those sufferers who could here in the open air as in the nave of a church. Mearly all rank, beyond the numerous oak benches which were set out Pierre had now succeeded in wheeling Marie's box to the front

: . whose close-packed mattresses and pillows all sorts of diseases were gathered nell-mell. Immediately on arriving, the young priest had recognised the Vignerons seated with their sorry child Gustave in the middle of a bench, and now, on the flagstones, he caught sight of the lace-trimmed bed of Madame Dieulafay, beside whom her husband and sister knelt in prayer. Moreover, all the patients of Madame de Jonquière's carriage took up position here-M. Sabathier and Brother Isidore side by side, Madame Vêtu reclining hopelessly in a conveyance, Elise Rouquet scated, La Grivotte excited and raising herself on her elenched hands. Pierre also again perceived Madame Maze, standing somewhat apart from the others, and humbling herself in prayer; whilst Madame Vincent, who had fallen on her knees, still holding her little Rose in her arms, presented the child to the Virgin with ardent entreaty, the distracted gesture of a mother soliciting compassion from the mother of divine grace. And around this reserved space was the ever-growing throng of pilgrims, the pressing, jostling mob which gradually stretched to the parapet overlooking the Gave.

"O Virgin most merciful," continued Marie in an undertone, "Virgin most faithful, Virgin conceived without sin!"

Then, almost fainting, she spoke no more, but with her lips still moving, as though in silent prayer, gazed distractedly at Pierre. He thought that she wished to speak to him and leant forward: "Shall I remain here, at your disposal, to take you to the piseina by-and-by?" he asked.

But as soon as she understood him she shook her head. And then in a feverish way she said, "No, no, I don't want to be bathed this morning. It seems to me that one must be truly worthy, truly pure, truly holy before seeking the miracle! I want to spend the whole morning in imploring it with joined hands; I want to pray, to pray with all my strength and all my soul—"She was stifling, and paused. Then she added: "Don't come to take me back to the Hospital till eleven o'clock. I will not let them take me from here till then.'

However, Pierre did not go away, but remained near her. For a moment, he even fell upon his knees; he also would have liked to pray with the same burning faith, to beg of God the eure of that poor sick child, whom he loved with such fraternal affection. But since he had reached the Grotto he had felt a singular sensation invading him, a covert revolt, as it were, which hampered the pious flight of his prayer. He wished to believe; he had spent the whole night hoping that belief would once more blossom in his soul, like some lovely flower of ignorance and eandour, as soon as he should have knelt upon the soil of that land of miracle. And yet he only experienced discomfort and anxiety in presence of the theatrical scene before him, that pale stiff statue in the false light of the tapers, with the chaplet while he listened; nevertheless, like the Baron, he at last bowed and a scared expression came over the Abbe's broad fatherly face there Father Fourcade likewise spoke to him for a moment, Then, as Abbé Judaine was also standing a contplaisant nod. Fourcade said to him; however he ended by approving it with The latter seemed much perplexed by something which Father at the foot of the pulpit, was deep in conference with Baron Suire. so unlike the preacher, he caught sight of Father Foureade, who, he thus examined Father Massias, astonished at feeling himself lence to Heaven to compel it to descend upon earth. And whilst eloquence which poured from his large mouth as he offered viohad formerly known him, and was quite stirred by his sombre ardour, by the sight of his thin face and sparkling eyes, by the Father Massias in the ecclesiastic who occupied the pulpit. Then, while his thoughts were still wandering, he recognised caressing touch of the sacred legend give themselves to it entirely? render it like the souls of little children, who at the slightest Could no divine dew again impregnate it with innocence, stone pulpit whence a Father of the Assumption was shouting shop full of jostling customers on the one hand, and the large

Then, all at once, Father Fourcade appeared in the pulpit, erect, drawing up his lofty figure which his attack of gout had slightly bent; and he had not wished that Father Massias, his well-loved brother whom he preferred above all others, should altogether go down the narrow stairway, for he had kept him upon one of the steps, and was leaning on his shoulder. And, in a full, grave voice, with an air of sovereign authority which a full, grave voice, with an around, he spoke as follows:

afull, grave voice, with an air of sovereign authority which a full, grave voice, with an air of sovereign authority which caused perfect silence to reign around, he spoke as follows:

"My dear Brethren, my dear Sisters, I ask your forgiveness for interrupting your prayers, but I have a communication to make to you, and I have to ask the help of all your faithful souls.

We had a very sad accident to deplore this morning, one of our brethren died in one of the trains by which you came to Lourdes, died just as he was about to set foot in the promised land."

died just as he was about to set foot in the promised land."

A brief pause followed and Father Foureade seemed to become yot taller, his handsome face beaming with fervour, amidst his long, streaming royal beard.

"Well, my dear Biethren, my dear Sisters," he resumed, "in spie of everything, the idea has come to me that we ought—not to despair. Who knows if God Almighty did not will that death in order that He might prove His omnipotence to the world? It is as though a voice were speaking to me, urging nie to ascend this pulpit and ask your prayers for this man, this man who is no more, but whose life is nevertheless in the hands of the most Blesnote, but whose life is nevertheless in the hands of the most Blesnote, but whose life is nevertheless in the hands of the most Blesnote, but whose life is nevertheless in the hands of the most Blesnote, but whose life is nevertheless in the hand, this favour. Yes, sed Virgin who can still implore her Divine Son in his favour. Yes, the man is here, I have caused his body to be brought hither, and it depends on you perhaps whether a brilliant miracle shall dazzle the universe, if you pray with sufficient ardour to touch the compassion of Heaven. We will plunge the man's body into the piseina and we will entreat the Lord, the master of the world to resuscitate him, to give unto us this extraordinary sign of his sovereign beneficence!"

An iey thrill, wasted from the Invisible, passed through the listeners. They had all become pale, and though the lips of none of them had opened, it seemed as if a murmur sped through their ranks amidst a shudder.

"But with what ardour must we not pray!" violently resumed Father Fourcade, exalted by genuine faith. "It is your souls, your whole souls, that I ask of you, my dear brothers, my dear sisters, it is a prayer in which you must put your hearts, your plood, your very life with whatever may be most noble and loving in it! Pray with all your strength, pray till you no longer know who you are, or where you are; pray as one loves, pray as one dies, for that which we are about to ask is so precious, so rare, so astounding a grace that only the energy of our worship can induce God to answer us. And in order that our prayers may be the more efficacious, in order that they may have time to spread and ascend to the feet of the Eternal Father, we will not lower the body into the piscina until four o'clock this afternoon. And now my dear Brethren, now my dear Sisters, pray, pray to the most Blessed Virgin, the Queen of the Angels, the Comforter of the Afflieted!"

Then he himself, distracted by emotion, resumed the recital of the rosary, whilst near him Father Massias burst into sobs. And thereupon the great anxious silence was broken, contagion seized upon the throng, it was transported and gave vent to shouts, tears, and confused stammered entreaties. It was as though a breath of delirium were sweeping by, reducing men's wills to naught, and turning all these beings into one being, exasperated with love and seized with a mad desire for the impossible prodigy.

And for a moment Pierre had thought that the ground was giving way beneath him, that he was about to fall and faint. But with difficulty he managed to rise from his knees and slowly walked away.

FOUNTAIN AND PISCINA III

hours before him. Vine o'clock was now striking, he had a couple of the trees. Accordingly the young priest passed on, and took his way under spite of the constant absent-mindedness of his volatile brain. doubtless praying for his daughter whom he fondly loved, in he hesitated, unwilling to disturb his meditations, for he was so that his first impulse was to go and join him. Then, however, managed to secure a couple of rooms in one or other of the hotels, seen him since the morning, and did not know whether he had Cuersaint, kneeling near the Crotto, with the absorbed air of one who is praying with his whole soul. The young priest had not unwilling to remain there any longer, he eaught sight of M. de As Pierre went off, ill at ease, mastered by invincible repugnance, promenade on the south, and the extensive fields spreading out northward beyond the Cave, as far as the wooded slopes. which the white-walled convents brightened. Under the foliage, solitary spots still abounded between the grassy wall limiting the however; merely the overflow of the crowd had settled there, and and it thus resembled an enclosed promenade, provided with benches, and shaded by magnificent trees, Nobody passed along, broad footway, and protected by a parapet. Some two or three hundred yards further on, a hill brought the avenue to an end, gain ground, and lay out a monumental quay bordered by a Gave. It had been necessary to put back the river's bed in order to pastured had been transformed into a superb avenue skirting the By dint of money, the wild bank where swine had formerly not even try to contend against his doubts by examining the onslaught upon human reason, had so disturbed him that he ha almost fainted. What would become of him then? Could h idolatry of the worship, the violence of the display of faith, Yet as soon as he had found hiniself at the Crotto, the his mother had made him join his hands, and taught him to fear believe even as he had done in the doeile days of childhood when desire to believe, an idea that he was indeed again beginning to Had he not reached Lourdes that morning possessed by a genuine soon found rest of mind again. He had questioned himself in the acute anxiety which he felt with regard to his sensations. Thus Pierre, like a man at last awakening from a painful dream, on the margin of the running water, one could enjoy delightful freeliness, even during the burning days of August.

profit? At all events, he had made a bad beginning, which left him sorely agitated, and he indeed needed the environment of those fine trees, that limpid, rushing water, that calm, cool avenue, to recover from the shock.

Still pondering, he was approaching the end of the pathway, when he most unexpectedly met a forgotten friend. He had, for a few seconds, been looking at a tall old gentleman who was coming towards him, dressed in a tightly-buttoned frock-coat and broad-brimmed hat; and he had tried to remember where it was that he had previously beheld that pale face, with eagle nose, and black penetrating eyes. These he had seen before, he felt sure of it; but the promenader's long white beard and long curly white hair perplexed him. However, the other halted, also looking extremely astonished, though he promptly exclaimed, "What, Pierre? Is it you, at Lourdes?"

Then all at once the young priest recognised Doctor Chassaigne. his father's old friend, his own friend, the man who had cured and consoled him in the terrible physical and mental crisis which had come upon him after his mother's death.

"Ahl my dear doctor, how pleased I am to see you!" he replied. They embraced with deep emotion. And now, in presence of that snowy hair and snowy beard, that slow walk, that sorrowful demeanour, Pierre remembered with what unrelenting feroeity misfortune had fallen on that unhappy man and aged him. But a few years had gone by, and now, when they met again, he was bowed down by destiny.

"You did not know, I suppose, that I had remained at Lourdes?" said the doctor. "It's true that I no longer write to anybody; in fact, I am no longer among the living. I live in the land of the dead." Tears were gathering in his eyes, and emotion made his voice falter as he resumed, "There! come and sit down on that bench yonder; it will please me to live the old days afresh with

In his turn the young priest felt his sobs choking him. He could only murmur, "Ahl my dear doctor, my old friend, I can truly tell you that I pitied you with my whole heart, my whole soul."

Doetor Chassaigne's story was one of disaster, the shipwreek of a life. He and his daughter Marguerite, a tall and lovable girl of twenty, liad gone to Cauterets with Madame Chassaigne, the model wife and mother, whose state of health had made them somewhat anxious. A fortnight had gone by, and she seemed much better, and was already planning several pleasure trips, when one morning she was found dead in her bed. Her husband and daughter were overwhelmed stupefied by this sudden blow, this cruel treachery of death. The doctor, who belonged Bartrès, had a family vault in the Lourdes cemetery, a vault constructed at his own expense, and in which his the was amazing, coming from a man with an shound, which has other, oil to yes mit bread tent bad of doily

He was gazing at M. Chassalgne, quite simpolied by someth matters?"

undeliever, or at least as one altogether halillerent to the ment and explained, "What doctor, so you now believe a miracles are possible? You, good heavenst whom I knew as "What doctor, so you now believe that" national pilgrimage. Then all at once ho gave a shul of courab M. de Guersaint and his daughter, all three luming part of the They talked together for a long time, and Pierre related under what circumstances he had reached Lounder that morning with Crofto to stray as far as the spot which they had chosen so to say, in a desert, for nobody toro himself aware from the the beautiful trees, the coolness was still delightful. And although the crowd was but a couple of hundred yards distant, they want golden dust upon the hillsides; but on that retired hench, under the bank behind them, and in front they licard the loud minimur of the Gave. The sun-rays were falling more licarily in a slow, Then silence fell. Birds were fluttering among the shruly on again." is all over, I am merely waiting till my time comes to juin thom could not go away, they are here and keep me with theme, The doctor made a gesture which embraced the horizona, here with your sorrow?"

a little on those who love you? Why did you shut yourself up "Ah, my old friend," repeated Pierre, "how I piticd youl How frightful must have been your grief! But why did you not rely.

slept the eternal sleep. quished everything, his studies, his practice in Paris, in order that he might live near the tomb in which his wife and his daughter at noontide, And he had refused to leave Lourdes, he had relinsaw their barefooted wives and daughters bring them their dimiers he envied the men who broke stones upon the highways when he shivered in his icy solitude. All the joy of his life had departed; nothing more than an old, miserable, stammering, lost being, who so warm by the love of two dear creatures all his own, was now so worshipped by his two helpmates, whose lieart had been keyet partment by the mother's side. The man who had been so happy. the very flower of her youth, who was laid in the vacant comhimself, but his daughter, lately radiant with beauty and health, in of the illness which had carried her off. And thus it was not without her distracted father being able to form any exact notion and, taking to her bed one evening, died two days afterwards guerite, who was with him, was seized with a great shivering, the burial he had lingered for a week at Lourdes, when Marjoining that in which he expected soon to lie hinself. And after that his wife should be interred there in a compartment adfather and mother already rested. He desired, therefore, savant of such intelligence, whose powerful analytical faculties he had formerly so much admired! How was it that a lofty clear mind, nourished by experience and method, had become so changed as to acknowledge the miraculous cures effected by that divine fountain which the Blessed Virgin had caused to spurt forth under the pressure of a child's fingers?

"But just think a little, my dear doctor," he resumed. "It was you yourself who supplied my father with memoranda about Bernadette, your little fellow-villager, as you used to call her; and it was you, too, who spoke to me at such length about her, when, later on, I took a momentary interest in her story. In your eyes she was simply an ailing child, prone to hallucinations, infantile, but half-conscious of her acts, deficient of will power. Recollect our chats together, my doubts, and the healthy reason which you again enabled me to acquire!"

Pierre was feeling very moved, for was not this the strangest of adventures? He, a priest, who had formerly resigned himself to endeavour to believe, had ended by completely losing all faith through intercourse with this same doctor, who was then an unbeliever, but whom he now found converted, conquered by the supernatural, whilst he himself was racked by the torture of no longer believing.

"You who would only rely on accurate facts," he said, "you who based everything on observation! Do you renounce science then?"

Chassaigne, hitherto quiet, with a sorrowful smile playing on his lips, now made a violent gesture expressive of sovereign contempt. "Science indeed!" he exclaimed. "Do I know anything? Can I accomplish anything? You asked me just now what malady it was that killed my poor Marguerite. But I do not know! I, whom people think so learned, so well armed against death, I understood nothing of it, and I could do nothing—not even prolong my daughter's life for a single hour! And my wife, whom I found in bed already cold, when on the previous evening she had lain down in much better health and quite gay—was I even capable of foreseeing what ought to have been done in her case? No, no! for me, at all events, science has become bankrupt. I wish to know nothing, I am but a fool and a poor old man!"

He spoke like this in a furious revolt against all his past life of pride and happiness. Then, having become calm again, he added, "And now I only feel a frightful remorse. Yes, a remorse which haunts me, which ever brings me here, prowling around the people who are praying. It is remorse for not having in the first instance come and humbled myself at that Grotto, bringing my two dear ones with me. They would have knelt there like those women whom you see. I should have knelt beside them, and perhaps the Blessed Virgin would have cured and preserved them. But, fool that I was, I only knew how to lose them! It is my fault."

can restore them to me!" sorrows of this world! I have given myself to God, since God-alone them elsewhere that is the one hope, the one consolation for all the one another again. Ohl the dear beings whom one has lost, my dear daughter, my dear wife, to see them once more, to live with her at times, she tells me that we shall meet, that we shall see she will live again, I am absolutely convinced of it, for I still hear her, who had not known life, there were nothing beyond the tomb? Would it not be the most monstrous injustice it for You knew my daughter, so tall and strong, so beautiful, so brimlast a conviction that there must be justice, a conviction that there must be love, which calmed me by restoring me my faith. humility, entreating God to take me in my turn. And it was at All sorts of ideas warred within me; I passed through periods of revolt when I shook my fist at Heaven, and then I lapsed into without being able to sleep, thinking that I should surely go mad, trightful, heavy blow which fell upon it! I spent a score of nights was the confusion, the aberration of my poor brain, under the and carry me on with its eternal prescience. How great at first which should think and determine for me, which should lull me my hands as in my younger days, I felt too wretched, too forsaken, I had too keen a need of a super-human help, of a divine power lost as a little child. What would you have, my friend? I joined morning. The prayer she taught me came back to my mind, word for word, when I again found myself alone, as weak, as, woman, made me join my hands and implore God's help each continued, "that in my childhood at Bartres, my mother, a peasant Tears were now streaming from his eyes. "I remember," he

there was discouragement, a doubt of all things ending in a need of certainty on the part of this old man whom age had softened and who felt happy at being able to fall saleep in credulity, shallow, powerless to prevent him from shedding tears. And finally piness, revolted against science on the day when it seemed to him human weariness; this man, to whom science had not brought hap years of positive study had rolled over it. Then, too, there was peasant mountaineers, who had been brought up in belief of the legend, and whom the legend had again mastered even when fifty ment. First of all, and this he had not previously suspected, he discovered a kind of atavism of faith in this Pyrenean, this son of He was staking with a slight tremor, like the weak old man he had become; and Pierre was at last able to understand and explain the conversion of this savant, this man of intellect who, growing old, had reverted to belief under the influence of senti-

"Ahi" he faintly sighed, "if I could only suffer enough to be abl minded become mere children again under such blows of fate Is it not indeed pitiful to see the strongest, the clearest Pierre did not protest, however; he did not jeer, for his hear was rent at sight of this tall, stricken sexagenarian, with his woefu to silence my reason, and kneel yonder and believe in all those

The pale smile, which at times still passed over Doetor Chassaigne's lips, reappeared on them. "You mean the miracles?" said he. "You are a priest, my child, and I know what your misfortune is. The miracles seem impossible to you. But what do you know of them? Admit that you know nothing, and that what to our senses seems impossible is every minute taking place. And now we have been talking together for a long time, and eleven o'clock will soon strike, so that you must return to the Grotto. However, I shall expect you at half-past three, when I will take you to the medical verification office, where I hope I shall be able to show you some surprising things. Don't forget, at half-past three."

Thereupon he sent him off, and remained on the bench alone. The heat had yet increased, and the distant hills were burning in the furnace-like glow of the sun. However, he lingered there forgetfully, dreaming in the greeny half-light amidst the foliage, and listening to the continuous murmur of the Gave, as if a voice, a dear voice from the realms beyond were speaking to him.

dear voice from the realms beyond, were speaking to him.

Pierre meantime hastened back to Marie. He was able to join her without much difficulty, for the crowd was thinning, a good many people having already gone off to déjeuner. And on arriving he perceived the girl's father, who was quietly scated beside her, and who at once wished to explain to him the reason of his long absence. For more than a couple of hours that morning he had scoured Lourdes in all directions, applying at twenty hotels in turn without being able to find the smallest closet where they might sleep. Even the servants' rooms were let and you could not have even secured a mattress on which to stretch yourself in some passage. However, all at onec, just as he was despairing, he had discovered two rooms, small ones, it is true, and just under the roof, but in a very good hotel, that of the Apparitions, one of the best patronised in the town. The persons who had retained these rooms had just telegraphed that the patient whom they had meant to bring with them was dead. Briefly, it was a piece of rare good luck, and seemed to make M. de Guersaint guite gay.

Eleven o'clock was now striking and the woeful procession of sufferers started off again through the sunlit streets and squares. When it reached the Hospital Marie begged her father and Pierre to go to the hotel, lunch and rest there awhile, and return to fetch her at two o'clock, when the patients would again be conducted to the Grotto. But when, after lunching, the two men went up to the rooms which they were to occupy at the Hotel of the Apparitions, M. de Guersaint, overcome by fatigue, fell so soundly asleep that Pierre had not the heart to awaken him. What would have been the use of it? His presence was not indispensable. And so the, young priest returned to the Hospital alone. Then the erossed itself amid all the joyousness of that splendid August day. du Rosaire, through an ever-growing crowd which shuddered and its way over the Plateau de la Merlasse, again crossed the Place cortège again descended the Avenue de la Crotte, again wended

When Marie was again installed in front of the Grotto she It was now the most glorious hour of a lovely afternoon.

"Yes," answered Pierre; "he inquired if her father were coming,

is only taking a little rest."

a state to find favour from Heaven, I wish to pray, to keep on and then in a sorely troubled voice she added, "Listen, Pierre; don't take me to the piscina for another hour. I am not yet in She waved her hand as though to say that he was acting rightly, approached saying, "If you feel too weak, my dear young lady, remember we have some broth here." was agitating her now that the moment for attempting the miracle was at hand. In fact, she began to relate, that she had been unable to eat anything, and a girl who overheard her at once the standard of the After evineing such an ardent desire to come to Lourdes, terror housewifely air, had succeeded in making herself look quite charmhaymonde, thanks to her freshness and her active, good-natured, .... posed on them. Nevertheless, in spite of this enforced simplicity, linen, with a small check pattern, blue and white, had been imsilk aprons trimmed with lace, that a uniform apron, of modest previous years, had displayed so much coquetry in the matter of of broth and milk among the sufferers. Some of them, indeed, in Marie looked at her and recognised Raymonde. Several young girls were in this wise employed at the Grotto to distribute cups

ing. "You will remember, won't you?" she added; "you have only to make me a sign and I will serve you."

hour, my friend," priest, she resumed. "One hour-you must allow me one more not be able to take anything; and then, turning towards the young Marie thanked her, saying, however, that she felt sure she would chin, erect in the centre of the reserved space, was at that moment a huge, excited throng was ever pressing and surging, A Capudrawn up in line, waiting to be bathed, whilst outside the rope, bath-chairs and others lying on the mattresses of their litters, were the tree trunks; and here various sufferers, some sitting in their six for the women and three for the men, he perceived under the trees a long stretch of ground enclosed by a rope fastened to tiont of the low buildings where the baths were, three by three, came upon an extraordinary spectacle which stayed his steps. erowd, he found himself carried towards the piscinas, where he there. So he had to retire, and, caught in the rolling waves of the Pierre wished at any rate to remain near her, but the entire space was reserved to the sufferers, the bearers not being allowed 124 LOURDES conducting the prayers, "Ayes" followed one after the other, repeated by the erowd in a loud, confused murmur. Then, all at once, as Madame Vincent, who, pale with agony, had long been waiting, was admitted to the baths, carrying her dear burden, her little girl who looked like a waxen image of the child Christ, the Capuchin let himself fall upon his knees with his arms extended. and eried aloud, "Lord, heaf our siek!" He raised this ery a dozen, twenty times, with a growing fury, and each time the crowd repealed it, growing more and more excited at each shout, till it sobbed and kissed the ground in a state of frenzy. It was like a hurricane of delirium rushing by and laying every head among the dust. Pierre was utterly distracted by the sob of suffering which arose from the very bowels of these poor folks—at first a prayer, growing louder and louder, then bursting forth like a demand in impatient, angry, deafening, obstinate accents, as though to compel the help of Heaven. "Lord, heal our sick!"—"Lord, heal our sick!" The shout soared on high incessantly.

An incident occurred, however; La Grivolte was weeping hot tears because they would not bathe her. "They say that I'm a consumptive," she praintively exclaimed, "and that they can't dip consumptives in cold water. Yet they dipped one this morning: I saw her. So why won't the: dip me? I've been wearing myself out for the last half-hour in telling them that they are only grieving the Blessed Virgin, for I am going to be cured, I feel it, I am going

As she was beginning to cause a scandal, one of the chaplains of the piscinas approached, and endeavoured to calm her. They would see what they could do for her, by-and-by, said he, they would consult the reverend Fathers; and, if she were very good, perhaps they would bathe her all the same.

Meantime the cry continued, "Lord, heal our siek! Lord, heal our siek!" And Pierre, who had just perceived Madame Vêtu, also waiting at the piscina entry, could no longer turn his eyes away from that hope-tortured face whose eyes were fixed upon the doorway by which the happy ones' the elect, emerged from the divine presence, cured of all their ailments. However. a sudden increase of the crowd's frenzy, a perfect rage of entreaties, gave him such a shock as to draw tears from his eyes. · Madame Vincent was now coming out again, still carrying her little girl in her arms, her wretehed, her fondly loved little girl, who had been dipped in a fainting state in the icy water, and whose ·little face, but imperfectly wiped, was as pale as ever, and indeed even more woeful and lifeless. The mother was sobbing, crucified by this long agony, reduced to despair by the refusal of the Blessed Virgin, who had remained insensible to her child's sufferings. And yet when Madame Vêtu in her turn entered, with the eager passion of a dying woman about to drink the water of life, the haunting, obstinate ery burst forth again, without sign of discouragement or lassifiedes. "Lord, Leaf our side Lord, lead our sickl" The Capuchin had now filler with live files out the howling crowd, with series consented. General and the howling crowd, with series consented.

with its kisses.

ionulain in such fury that folks no longer noticed her disessed finid like a sponge; and the crowd around her rushed upon the 1ace-a handkerchief which she had soaked with the mizzenicus employing the water of the fountain as a letten, every true hours aince her arrival that morning. She lenelt down, there has no her fine along time applied a hardleneties, to her fish, and for a long time applied a hardleneties, so her along time applied a hardleneties. sore which was eating away her face, had conserved here! with water, and washed his eyes seven that said and washed his eyes seems that said washed but of shells, in galact said to was particularly interested by the eggin of said to who, thinking it useless to go to the piscient of said to who, thinking it useless to go to the piscient of said to who, thinking it useless to said the piscient of said to who, thinking it useless to said the piscient of said to said the piscient of said to said the said the said the said to said the s to althord one young man onw arm gauge one booken every lingered there a long time, the water drightly on their issu-who had no cans to fill at least cerns to dirth and main their paces. wont too great a waste of water, the mg ordy acred with the hand, And thus many was pressed with the hand, And thus many was pressed with the hand. hither to fill bottles, metal cans, and annewers राम्येयक् 🗔 ाम्taps from which the water fell into a marrier last sale. low buildings, a long store well with cerved orging and a green necessary to form processors sectoric free were the y which another throng besieged _ Lbeze grant rethons deidw amenia am amenia mang ang gaisesg moni min bahayang kind, encouraging words, but a fresh sufficient of fifterings into 1755 Pierre wished to join Madame Vincent it moint believe with

with trembling hands Another one, a consumptive who and wrapped himself in the curtain before putting on a bandage man, whom Pierre found there when he entered, was still naked, themselves with an awkward haste, a nervous kind of shame. One waiting-room having a paved floor, and furnish with a bench and a couple of chairs. Here the patients undressed and dressed hung before each entry, which was reached through a kind of then, in order that one might isolate the patient, a linen curtain ments, three baths separated by partitions with steps leading into be very well arranged. They were divided into three compart-These piscinas seemed to the young priest to another patient. nearly half-an-liour, whilst Cerard returned to the Crotto to fetch thus Pierre lingered with the sufferer in the men's piscina tor easy task to move and bathe this helpless victim of ataxia. And and asked him to come and help him, for it would not be an Just then, however, Cérard, who passed by dragging M. Sabathier to the piscinas, called to Pierre, whom he saw unoccupied, which she constantly moistened her handkerchief. face, but washed themselves and drank from the same pipe at livid skin mottled with violet marks. However, Pierre became more interested in Brother Isidore, who was just being removed from one of the baths. He had fainted away, and for a moment, indeed, it was thought that he was dead. But at last he began moaning again, and one's heart filled with pity at sight of his long, lank frame, which suffering had withered, and which, with his diseased hip, looked a human remnant on exhibition. The two hospitallers who had been bathing him had the greatest difficulty to put on his shirt, fearful as they were that if he were suddenly shaken he might expire in their arms.

"You will help me, Monsieur l'Abbé, won't you?" asked another hospitaller as he began to undress M. Sabathier.

Pierre hastened to give his services, and found that the attendant, discharging such humble duties, was none other than the Marquis de Salmon-Roquebert whom M. de Guersaint had pointed out to him on the way from the station to the Hospital that morning. A man of forty, with a large, aquiline knightly nose set in a long face, the marquis was the last representative of one of the most ancient and illustrious families of France. Possessing a large fortune, a regal mansion in the Rue de Lille at Paris and vast estates in Normandy, he came to Lourdes, each year, for the three days of the national pilgrimage, influenced solely by his benevolent feelings, for he had no religious zeal and simply observed the rites of the Church because it was customary for noblemen to do so. And he obstinately declined any high functions. Resolved to remain a hospitaller, he had that year assumed the duty of bathing the patients, exhausting the strength of his arms, employing his fingers from morning till night in handling rags and re-applying dressings to sores.

"Be careful," he said to Pierre; "take off the stockings very

"Be careful," he said to Pierre; "take off the stockings very slowly. Just now, some flesh came away when they were taking off the things of that poor fellow who is being dressed again.

over yonder.

Then, leaving M. Sabathier for a moment in order to put on the shoes of the unhappy sufferer whom he alluded to, the Marquis found the left shoe wet inside. Some matter had flowed into the fore part of it, and he had to take the usual medical precautions before putting it on the patient's foot, a task which he performed with extreme care, and so as not to touch the man's leg, into which an ulcer was eating.

"And now," he said to Pierre as he returned to M. Sabathier, "pull down the drawers at the same time as I do, so that we may get them off at one pull."

In addition to the patients and the hospitallers selected for duty at the piscinas, the only person in the little dressing-room was a chaplain who kept on repeating "Paters" and "Aves," for not even a momentary pause was allowed in the prayers. Merely a with a mouldy smell like that of a cellar dripping with water. windows of the building, and constant dampness reigned there, our sickl Lord, heal our sick!" A cold-light fell from the high piercing shouts of the Capuchin, who ever repeated: "Lord, heal of the throng were incessantly wafted into the room, with the which the rope enclosed; and the ardent clamorous entreaties loose curtain hung before the doorway leading to the open space a little apron which had been fastened about his loins for decency's At last M. Sabathier was stripped, divested of all garments save Sake.

"Pray don't plunge me," said he; "let me down into the water hundred patients being dipped in the same water, it can be imagined what a terrible soup the latter at last became. All water of the baths to be changed twice a day. And nearly a scarcely inviting; for, through fear lest the output of the source should not suffice, the Fathers of the Grotto only allowed the than that icy cold. And then too, as he put it, the water was again, According to his account there could be no worse torture sensation on the first occasion that he had sworn never to begin still wont to relate that he had experienced such a frightful chilling In point of fact that cold water quite terrified him. He was by degrees."

quis, who had taken hold of him under the hips in order to carry "Contly, gently," repeated M. Sabathier to Pierre and the maremerge alive from their immersion in such filth. diseases; the miraculous feature of it all being that men should poisonous germ, a quintessence of the most dreaded contagious consomme of all ailments, a field of cultivation for every kind of manner of things were found in it, so that it was like a frightful.

of the day ended by slightly warming it.

"We will let you slide down the steps," explained the Marquis in an undertone; and then he instructed Pierre to hold the patient that he preferred the polluted baths of the afternoon, since all However, his dread of the cold was so great patches of scum. him to the bath. And he gazed with childlike terror at that thick, livid water on which floated so many greasy, nauseating

M. Sabathier was then slowly lowered. You could now only "Have no lear," replied the priest; "I will not let go."

with all his strength under the armpits.

mottled by the rippling of a shiver. And when they dipped him, see his pack, his poor painful back which swayed and swelled,

M. de Salmon-Roquebert repeated the cry, which the regularenewed fervour: "Lord, heal our sick! Lord, heal our sick!" The chaplain, standing beside the bath had begun calling with his head fell back in a spasm, a sound like the cracking of bones was heard, and, breathing hard, he almost stifled.

tions required the hospitallers to raise at each fresh immersion.

Pierre, therefore, had to imitate his companion, and his pitiful feelings at the sight of so much suffering were so intense that he regained some little of his faith. It was long indeed since he had prayed like this, devoutly wishing that there might be a God in Heaven, whose omnipotence could assuage the wretchedness of humanity. At the end of three or four minutes, however, when with great difficulty they drew M. Sabathier, livid and shivering, out of the bath, the young priest fell into deeper, more despairing sorrow than ever at beholding how downcast, how overwhelmed the sufferer was at having experienced no relief. Again had he made a futile attempt; for the seventh time the Blessed Virgin had not deigned to listen to his prayers. He closed his eyes, from between the lids of which big tears began to roll while they were dressing him again.

Then Pierre recognised little Gustave Vigneron coming in, on his crutch, to take his first bath. His relatives, his father, his mother, and his aunt, Madame Chaise, all three of substantial appearance and exemplary piety, had just fallen on their knees at the door. Whispers ran through the crowd; it was said that the gentleman was a functionary of the Ministry of Finances: However, while the child was beginning to undress a tumult arose, and Father Foureade and Father Massias, suddenly arriving, gave orders to suspend the immersions. The great miraele was about to be attempted, the extraordinary favour which had been so ardently prayed for since the morning-the restoration of the dead man to life.

The prayers were continuing outside, rising in a furious appeal which died away in the sky of that warm summer afternoon. Two bearers came in with a covered stretcher, which they deposited in the middle of the dressing-room. Baron Suire, President of the Association, followed, accompanied by Berthaud, one of its principal officers, for the affair was eausing a great stir among the whole staff, and before anything was done a few words were exchanged in low voices between the gentlemen and the two Fathers of the Assumption. Then the latter fell upon their knees, with arms extended, and began to pray, their faces illumined, transfigured by their burning desire to see God's omnipotence displayed.

"Lord, hear us! Lord, grant our prayer!" M. Sabathier had just been taken away, and the only patient now present was little Gustave, who had remained on a chair, half-undressed and forgotten. The curtains of the stretcher were raised, and the man's corpse appeared, already stiff, and seemingly reduced and shrunken, with large eyes which had obstinately remained wide open. It was necessary, however, to undress the body, which was still fully elad, and this terrible duty made the bearers momentarily hesitate.

Pierre noticed that the Marquis de Salmon-Roquebert, who ing that lifeless corpse. And the young priest thereupon followed nance whenever they were in question, had now drawn aside showed such devotion to the living, such freedom from all repug-praying in so loud a voice that it drowned that of his superior, Father Massias meanwhile was gradually becoming excited, his example, and knelt near him in order to keep countenance.

Father Fourcade: "Lord, restore our brother to usl" he cried.

come off. In fact the corpse ought to have been raised up; and the other hospitaller, who was unbuttoning the dead man's old trousers, but his legs were so stiff that the garment would not One of the hospitallers had already begun to pull at the man's eut everything away with a pair of scissors. Otherwise there frock-coat, remarked in an undertone that it would be best to

would be no end of the job.

no harm would have been done. This is what he hastily said to the bearers, and forthwith he helped them to pass some straps easy to procure fresh clothes for him; and in the contrary event, piscina, clad as it was. Should the man resuscitate, it would be therefore, of pulling the corpse about in order to strip it bare, Berthaud, was of opinion that, it would be better to dip it in the forc, was to finish with the affair at once, showing as much respect as possible for the remains of the deceased. In lieu, man's behalf ever since the morning. The wisest course, therecrowd was waiting and had been entreating God on the dead Fourcade's action in making such an attempt, only they could not now do otherwise than carry matters to an issue; for the As a politician he secretly disapproved of Father Baron Suire. Berthaud, however, rushed up to them, after rapidly consulting

O Lord, and he shall be born anew! Restore his soul to him, Father Massias prayed with increased fervour: "Breathe upon him, Father Foureade had nodded his approval of this course, whilst under the man's hips and arms, shoulder-straps; as they made the attempt, the man almost sank to the bottom of the bath. And how could he have rec In vain did the hospitallers try to raise it by pulling the But the repulsive part of it all was, that in spite of the rigor mortis, the head fell backward into the water, and was submerged the deceased, who floated like a man who has been drowned. the immersion of this corpse in its sorry garments, which on being wetted clung to the boncs, outlining the skeleton-like figure of him into the water, at each moment fearing that he would slip away from their liold. Pierre, although overcome by horror, could not do otherwise than look at them, and thus he distinctly beheld means of the straps, earried him to the bath, and slowly lowered Making an effort, the two hospitallers now raised the man by his breath when his mouth was full of water, his staring eyes seemingly dying afresh, beneath that watery veil?

C Lord, that he may glorify Theel?

Then, during the three long minutes allowed for the immersion, the two Fathers of the Assumption and the chaplain, in a paroxysm of desire and faith, strove to compel the intervention of Heaven, praying in such loud voices that they seemed to choke.

"Do Thou but look on him, O Lord, and he will live again!

"Do Thou but look on him, O Lord, and he will live again Lord may he raise at Thy voice to convert the earth! Lord! Thou hast but one word to say and all Thy people will acclaim Thee!" At last, as though some vessel had broken in his throat, Father

At last, as though some vessel had broken in his throat, Father Massias fell groaning and choking on his elbows, with only enough strength left him to kiss the flagstones. And from without came the clamour of the crowd, the ever-repeated cry which the Capuchin was still leading: "Lord, heal our sick! Lord, heal our sick!" This appeal scemed so singular at that moment, that Pierre's sufferings were increased. He could feel, too, that the marquis was shuddering beside him. And so the relief was general when Berthaud, thoroughly annoyed with the whole business, curtly shouted to the hospitallers: "Take him out! Take him out at once!"

The body was removed from the bath and laid on the stretcher, looking like the corpse of a drowned man with its sorry garments clinging to its limbs. The water was trickling from the hair, and rivulets began falling on either side, spreading out in pools on the floor. And naturally, dead as the man had been, dead he remained.

The others had all risen and stood looking at him amidst a distressing silence. Then as he was covered up, and carried away, Father Fourcade followed the bier leaning on the shoulder of Father Massias and dragging his gouty leg, the painful weight of which he had momentarily forgotten. But he was already recovering his strong serenity, and as a hush fell upon the crowd outside, he could be heard saying: "My dear brothers, my dear sisters, God has not been willing to restore him to us, doubtless because in His infinite goodness He has desired to retain him among His elect."

And that was all; there was no further question of the dead man. Patients were again being brought into the dressing-room, the two other baths were already occupied. And now little Gustave, who had watched that terrible seene with his keen inquisitive eyes, evincing no sign of terror, finished undressing himself. His wretched body, the body of a scrofulous child, appeared with its prominent ribs and projecting spine, its limbs so thin that they looked like mere walking-sticks. Especially was this the case as regards the left one, which was withered, wasted to the bone; and he also had two sores, one on the hip and the other in the loins, the last a terrible one, the skin being caten away, so that you distinctly saw the raw flesh. Yet he smiled, years old and looking no more than ten, he seemed to be endowed rendered so precocious by his sufferings that, although but fifteen in his arms, refused Pierre's offer of service: "Thanks, but he weighs no more than a bird. And don't be frightened, my dear little fellow. I will do it gently."

The Marquis de Salmon-Roquebert, who had taken him gently with the reason and philosophy of a grown man.

hasten his steps.

"Oh, I am not afraid of cold water, monsieur," replied the boy;

you may duck me."

had been dipped. Madame Vigneron and Madame Chaise, Who were not allowed to enter, had remained at the door on their knees, whilst the father, M. Vigneron, who was admitted into the Then he was lowered into the bath in which the dead man since struck and that Marie must be waiting for him made him The sudden idea that three o'clock must have long, Finding that his services were no longer required, Pierre now dressing-room, went on making the sign of the cross.

the crowd, he saw the girl arrive in her little conveyance, dragged

However, whilst he was endeavouring to piered himself repeating the prayers of the crowd, in a distressful the thought that when little ones really love and entreat the powerful they end by obtaining favours. And at last he caught remained, making him long to hundle himself and supplicate, in believed. His desperate affection for Marie alone мияс ис fatique, his brain depressed, no longer knowing what he saw, or. the terrible things that he had beheld, worn out with physical depths of his distracted being. He was still under the blow of all ever, it was in vain that he sought for words of prayer in the she was certain of it, would she not assuredly be cured? Crotto, cured without doubt and singing a hymn of praise. humbly kneeling, in order that he might take her back to the tell upon his knees. It was there that he would wait for her, into the piscina reserved for women, and then, in mortal sorrow, He confid find no answer, but watched her as she was taken. friend, did you forget me?" And at sight of Pietre she reproached him, saying, "What, my". a conviction that she was at last in a frame of mind to find grace. along by Cérard, who had not ceased transporting sufferers to the piscina. She had become impatient, suddenly filled with her eyes as though to avoid meeting those of the pric discouragement hollowed and lengthened her face, and she had not touched. And she was not cured. The stupor of infinite fastened above her head in a heavy golden coil which the water Marie reappeared in her little conveyance. Her face was very Ten minutes, a quarter of an hour perhaps, went by. Lord, heal our sickl" voice that came from the depths of his being: "Lord, heal our"

thunder-struck, chilled to the heart, at last made up his mind to grasp the handle of the little vehicle so as to take the girl back to the Grotto.

And meantime the ery of the faithful, who with open arms were kneeling there and kissing the earth, again rose with a growing fury, excited by the Capuchin's shrill voice: "Lord, heal our siek! Heal our siek, O Lord!"

· As Pierre was placing Marie in position again in front of the Grotto, an attack of weakness came over her and she almost fainted. Gérard, who was there, saw Raymonde quiekly hurry to the spot with a cup of broth, and at once they began zealously rivalling each other in their attentions to the ailing girl. Raymonde, holding out the cup in a pretty way, and assuming the coaxing airs of an expert nurse, especially insisted that Marie should accept the bouillon; and Gérard, glancing at this portionless girl, could not help finding her charming, already expert in the business of life, and quite ready to manage a household with a firm hand without ceasing to be amiable. Berthaud was no doubt right, this was the wife that he, Gérard, needed.

"Mademoiselle," said he to Raymonde, "shall I raise the young lady a little?"

Thank you, monsieur, I am quite strong enough. And besides.

I will give it her in spoonfuls; that will be the better way."

Marie, however, obstinately preserving her fierce silence as she recovered consciousness, refused the broth with a gesture. She wished to be left in quietness, she did not want anybody to question her. And it was only when the others had gone off smiling at one another, that she said to Pierre in a husky voice: "Has not my father come then?"

After hesitating for a moment the priest was obliged to confess the truth. "I left him sleeping, and he cannot have woke up."

Then Marie relapsed into her state of languid stupor and dismissed him in his turn, with the gesture with which she declined all succour. She no longer prayed, but remained quite motionless, gazing fixedly with her large eyes at the marble Virgin, the white statue amidst the radiance of the Grotto. And as four o'clock was now striking, Pierre with his heart sore went off to the Verification Office, having suddenly remembered the appointment given him by Doetor Chassaigne.

VERIFICATION

of motion. man's sight, some deaf woman's hearing, or some paralytic's power news spread of any miracle, such as the restoration of some blind who went in, and acclaiming them as they came out whenever the pilgrims was assembled, waylaying and questioning the patients tion Office, in front of which a compact and feverish crowd of THE doctor was waiting for the young priest outside the Verifica-

We going to have a miracle—a real, incontestable one, I mean?"
The doctor smiled, indulgent despite his new faith, "Al, well," Pierre had no little difficulty in making his way through the throng, but at last he reached his triend. "Well," he asked, "are said he, "a miracle is not worked to order. God intervenes when ral meeting-room, which was by no means so large as it should into two apartments, first a narrow antechamber, and then a genefied was very hally installed in a wretched wooden shanty divided enter with his companion. The office where the cures were veriall knew M. Chassaigne, and respectfully drew aside to let him Some hospitallers were mounting guard at the door, but they He pleases."

The only article of furniture in the ante-chamber was a wooden of the Rosary, were already being fitted up. which view some large premises, under one of the inclined ways department with better accommodation the following year; with However, there was a question of providing the have been.

ers and pamphlets, and finally some thirty rush-seated chairs placed here and there over the floor, and a couple of ragged ann-"eanterbury" littered with untidy papers, sets of documents, registand not even covered with a cloth; together with a kind of big ing simply of two deal tables of unequal height placed end to end peeped in. The furniture was of a very rudimentary kind, consistfor it was no sooner set ajar than a crowd of inquisitive heads One dared not even open this window to admit a little fresh air, pressing throng outside might see nothing of what went on within. panes of its single window covered with whitening, so that the face. It was a square bare room, painted a light yellow, with the surprised him, whilst the sufficeating heat within those wooden walls on which the sun was so hercely playing, almost scorched his the meeting room the number of persons packed inside it quite their turn in the charge of a young hospitaller. But on entering bench on which Pierre perceived two female patients awaiting chairs usually reserved for the patients.

133

the most open manner. patrons had nothing to hide, and that everything took place in to a full performance, again and again repeating that he and his and with an affectation of smiling good-nature was treating him for he had compelled the journalist to take the second arm-chair, Such at all events appeared to be M. Bonamy's opinion,

"We only desire light," he exclaimed, "We never cease to call tor the investigations of all willing men.

of their ailments," mit themselves to our examination, have really lost all symptoms. and explain. We are simply here to see if the patients, who submiracles; for we doctors do not take upon ourselves to interpret the sun itself. Pray notice, moreover, that I say eures and not are those which are thoroughly proven, which are as apparent as them they would all be healed. But the only cures we accept to the journalist he added in an undertone: "If we were to believe when there are more distinct signs of improvement." And turning come, my girl, this is only a beginning. You must come back promising ease, he addressed her somewhat roughly: "Come, Then, as the alleged cure of the deaf girl did not seem at all a which, taken for all in all, was very comfortable and pleasant. which had both its inconveniences and its advantages, but contrived to secure an exceptional position at the Crotto, a position, come to pass; and thus, in the declining years of his lite, he had ing without believing, he knew that science was yet so obscure, so full of surprises, that what seemed impossible might always in order that his rectitude might not be called in question. Believ-Thereupon he struck an attitude. Doubiless he spoke like this show if that ailment had really disappeared. ascertain the nature of the ailment, and then examination would necessary to consult his or her set of documents in order to cure took place and the cured person came forward, it was only quite a record of the illness in its various stages. And thus it a cates given by several doctors, hospital bulletins and so forthhad been attending the case. At times even there were certifiwhich there was almost always a certificate of the doctor who began to explain his mode of proceeding. Each patient who accompanied the pilgrimage arrived provided with papers, amongst And now, in reply to a question from the Paris journalist, he the influential writer, began to bring forward the objections which was delighted therefore when the little fair-haired gentleman, inconvenience. And thus, interested as he was by Doctor Bonamy's explanations, and destrous of forming an opinion, he would have spoken out and questioned, had it not been for his cloth, which condemned him to remain in the background. He once more. It was only the heat which at present caused him any resting himself, he had grown calmer, and his mind was clear Pierre was now listening. Since he had been there, seated and at once occurred to him.1 Was it not most unfortunate that one doctor should diagnose the illness and that another should verify the cure? In this mode of proceeding there was certainly a source of frequent error. The better plan would have been for a medical commission to examine all the patients as soon as they arrived at Lourdes and draw up reports on every case, to which reports the same commission would have referred whenever an alleged cure was brought before it. Doctor Bonamy, however, did not fall in with this suggestion. He replied, with some reason, that a commission would never suffice for such gigantic labour. think of it! A thousand patients to examine in a single morning! And how many different theories there would be, how many contrary diagnoses, how many endless discussions, all of a nature to increase the general uncertainty! The preliminary examination of the patients, which was almost always impossible, would, even if attempted, leave the door open for as many errors as the present system. In practice, it was necessary to remain content with the certificates delivered by the medical men who had been in attendance on the patients, and these certificates accordingly acquired capital, decisive importance. Doctor Bonamy ran through the documents lying on one of the tables and gave the Paris journalist some of these certificates to read. A great many of them unfortunately were very brief. Others, more skilfully drawn up, clearly specified the nature of the complaint; and some of the doctors' signatures were even certified by the mayors of the localities where they resided. Nevertheless doubts remained, innumerable and not to be surmounted. Who were these doctors? Who could tell if they possessed sufficient scientific authority to write as they did? With all respect to the medical profession, were there not innumerable doctors whose attainments were very limited? And, besides, might not these have been influenced by circumstances that one knew nothing of, in some cases by considerations of a personal character? One was tempted to ask for an inquiry respecting each of these medical men. Since everything was based on the documents supplied by the patients, these documents ought to have been most carefully controlled; for there could be no proof of any miracle if the absolute certainty of the alleged ailments had not been demonstrated by stringent examination.

Very red and covered with perspiration, Doetor Bonamy waved his arms. "But that is the course we follow, that is the course we follow!" said he. "As soon as it seems to us that a case of cure cannot be explained by natural means, we institute a minute inquiry, we request the person who has been cured to return here for further examination. And as you can see we surround oursclves with all means of enlightenment. These gentlemen here, who very detailed report of each discussion is drawn up. You hear come from all parts of France. We always entreat them to express their doubts if they feel any, to discuss the cases with us, and a are listening to us, are nearly every one of them doctors who have mena, but considerations of courtesy deterred them from entering Not one of the onlookers spoke. Most of the doctors present me, gentlemen, by all means protest if anything occurs here of a themselves growing angry, they simply left the room. as men of sense their discomfort became too great, and they felt into discussions which they knew would have been useless. When bowed. As for the others, the unbelievers, the savants pure and simple, they looked on and evinced some interest in certain phenowere undoubtedly Catholics, and naturally enough they merely added with a smile: "Ahl I was forgetting, I am not quite alone, I have Raboin, who helps me to keep things a little bit in order may think, for, I repeat it, they simply consist in verifying cures whenever any take place." However, he corrected himself, and functions as doctor of the Crotto are not so complicated as you to accomplish so much work, he replied: "Yes, all alone; but my triumphant, and on the journalist asking him if he were all alone As nobody breathed a word, Doctor Bonamy became quite anger when anybody disputed a prodigy. The appeal to the doctors had made him quite lose his temper, and his superior had at the Verification Office, where he was ever ready to growl with called in question. And thus he often suffered from his duties a heavy face and bull-dog jaw. Raboin was an ardent believer, one of those excited beings who did not allow the mingles to be So saying he pointed to a stout, greyhaired man of forty, with here," to calm him.

&lt;sup>1</sup>The reader will doubtless have understood that the Parisian journalist is none other than M. Zola himself—Trans.

However, the defile of patients was resumed. A man was now "Come, Raboin, my friend, be quietl" said Doctor Bonamy. "All sincere opinions are entitled to a hearing."

months of absolute dumbness had just recovered her voice at the Then there was a woman afflicted with nervous aphonia, who after members of her family whom she had brought with her to Lourdes. torchlight procession that same evening with the twenty-seven already relieved her so much, that she proposed taking part in the At present she was a morphinomaniae, but her first batli had birth to four children, and had then again fallen into consumption, n litst time, seven years previously, she had subsequently given year, and always went away feeling relieved. Then came a lady, a counters, who was fearfully emaciated, and whose story was an extraordinary one. Cured of tuberculosis by the Blessed Virgin, was not eured, but simply declared that he came to Lourdes every he took off his shirt a kind of grey flour fell from his skin. brought in whose trunk was so covered with cerema that when moment when the Blessed Sacrament went by at the head of the four o'clock procession.

"Gentlemen," declared Doctor Bonamy, affecting the graciousness of a savant of extremely liberal views, "as you are aware, we do not draw any conclusions when a nervous affection is in question. Still you will kindly observe that this woman was treated at the Salpêtrière for six months, and that she had to come here to find her tongue suddenly loosened."

Despite all these fine words, he displayed some little impatience, for he would have greatly liked to show the gentleman from Paris one of those remarkable instances of cure which occasionally presented themselves during the four o'clock procession—that being the moment of grace and exaltation when the Blessed Virgin interceded for those whom she had chosen. But on this particular afternoon there had apparently been none. The cures which had so far passed before them were doubtful ones, deficient in interest. Meanwhile, out of doors, you could hear the stamping and roaring of the crowd, goaded into a frenzy, by repeated hymns, enfevered by its earnest desire for the divine interposition, and growing more and more enervated by the delay.

All at once, however, a smiling, modest-looking young girl, whose clear eyes sparkled with intelligence, entered the office. "Ah!" exclaimed Doctor Bonamy joyously, "here is our little friend Sophie. A remarkable cure, gentlemen, which took place at the same season last year, and the results of which I will ask permission to show you.

Pierre had immediately recognised Sophie Couteau, the miraculée who had got into the train at Poitiers. And he now witnessed a repetition of the scene which had already been acted in his presence. Doctor Bonamy began giving detailed explanations to the little fair-haired gentleman, who displayed great attention. The case, said the doctor, had been one of caries of the bones of the left heel, with a commencement of necrosis necessitating excision; and yet the frightful, suppurating sore had been healed in a minute at the first immersion in the piscina.

"Tell the gentleman how it happened, Sophie," he added.

The little girl made her usual pretty gesture as a sign to everybody to be attentive. And then she began: "Well, it was like this; my foot was past cure, I couldn't even go to church any more, and it had to be kept bandaged because there was always a lot of matter coming from it. Monsieur Rivoire, the doctor, who had made a cut in it so as to see inside it, said that he should be obliged to take out a piece of the bone; and that, sure enough, would have made me lame for life. But when I got to Lourdes, and had prayed a great deal to the Blessed Virgin, I went to dip my foot in the water, wishing so much that I might be cured, that I did not even take the time to pull the bandages off. And everything with my foot when I took it out." remained in the water, there was no longer anything the matter approving nod. "And what did your doctor say, Sophie?" he asked. Doctor Bonamy listened, and punctuated each word with an

A burst of laughter rang out. The doctor's remark was sure to this child, it is all the same to me; but in all truth, she is cured." foot again, he said: 'Whether it be God or the devil who has cured When I got back to Vivonne, and Monsieur Rivoire saw my produce an effect.

the superintendent of your ward?" "And what was it, Sophie, that you said to Madame la Comtesse, me the first day, as I should have run out of linen on the morrow." and I said to her, It was very kind of the Blessed Virgin to cure 'Ah, yesl I hadn't brought many bandages for my foot with me, by heart, in too recitative a manner, but, nevertheless, remaining at sceing her look so pretty, telling her story, which she now knew Then there was fresh laughter, a general display of satisfaction very touching and truthful in appearance,

"Take off your shoe, Sophie," now said Doctor Bonamy: "show your toot to these gentlemen. Let them feel it. Nobody must rctain any doubt,"

could not be explained in any natural way. bone and flesh must have been instantly formed, and this, of course, entered into technical particulars, demonstrating that a fragment of that a trace, a proof of the miracle, might remain. Then he that if the Blessed Virgin had left a sear, it was certainly in order her no more trouble. Doctor Bonamy, however, quickly replied foot while she was about it, for this would assuredly have given politeness, inquired why the Blessed Virgin had not made a new Others, whose opinions, no doubt, were already formed, did not disturb themselves, though one of them, with an air of extreme of the medical men had drawn near, and looked on in silence. whose whity seam testified to the gravity of the complaint. Some The little foot promptly appeared, very white, very clean, carefully tended indeed, with its scar just below the ankle, a long scar, doubt should remain, the truth would have to be as patent, would be-a divine power. But it would be necessary diat not a master of the carth. Just think what an extraordinary power it and the nations would come. I should cause the miracles to be verified in such an indisputable manner, that I should be the I should manage it, but at all events I would summon the nations, I would turn the world topsy-turvy. I do not know exactly how I possessed a source which could thus close up sores and wounds, as great, and I shall bow to it respectfully." Then he added: "If let it come out with the cut cicatrised. The miracle will be quite a singer cut with a penknife, let me see it dipped in the water, and is no need of any such complicated affair. Let me merely see "Mon Dieul" interrupted the little fair-haired gentleman, "there apparent as the sun itself. The whole world would behold it and believe!"

LOURDES

140

Then he began discussing various methods of control with the doctor. He had admitted that, owing to the great number of patients, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to examine them all on their arrival. Only, why didn't they organise a special ward at the Hospital, a ward which would be reserved for cases of visible sores? They would have thirty such cases all told, which might be subjected to the preliminary examination of a committee. Authentic reports would be drawn up, and the sores might even be photographed. Then, if a case of cure should present itself, the commission would merely have to authenticate it by a fresh report. And in all this there would be no question of any internal complaint, the diagnostication of which is difficult, and liable to be controverted. There would be visible evidence of the ailment, and cure could be proved.

Somewhat cmbarrassed, Doctor Bonamy replied: "No doubt, no doubt, all we ask for is enlightenment. The difficulty would lie in forming the committee you speak of. If you only knew how little medical men agree! However there is certainly an idea in what you say."

Fortunately, a fresh patient now came to his assistance. Whilst little Sophie Couteau, already forgotten, was putting on her shoes again, Elise Rouquet appeared, and, removing her wrap, displayed her diseased face to view. She related that she had been bathing it with her handkerchief ever since the morning, and it seemed to her that her sore, previously so fresh and raw, was already beginning to dry and grow paler in colour. This was true; Pierre noticed with great surprise, that the aspect of the sore was now less horrible. This supplied fresh food for the discussion on visible sores, for the little fair-haired gentleman clung obstinately to his idea of organising a special ward. Indeed, said he, if the condition of this girl had been verified that morning, and she should be cured, what a triumph it would have been for the Grotto, which could have claimed to have healed a lupus! It would then have no longer been possible to deny that miracles were worked.

Doetor Chassaigne had so far kept in the background, motionless and silent, as though he desired that the facts alone should exercise their influence on Pierre. But he now leant forward and said to him in an undertone: "Visible sores, visible sores indeed! That gentleman can have no idea that our most learned medical men suspect many of these sores to be of nervous origin. Yes, we are discovering that complaints of this kind are often simply due to bad nutrition of the skin. These questions of nutrition are still so imperfectly studied and understood! And some medical men are also beginning to prove that the faith which heals can even cure sores, certain forms of lupus among others. And so I would ask what certainty that gentleman would obtain with his ward for visible sores?

ing the eternal question. No, nol Science is vain, it is a sea of There would simply be a little more confusion and passion in argu-

He smiled sorrowfully whilst Doctor Bonamy, after advising uncertainty."

air: "At all events, gentlemen, there are signs of improvement in each day for further examination, repeated with his prudent, affable Elisc Rouquet to continue using the water as lotion and to return

But all at once the office was fairly turned topsy-turvy by the this case-that is beyond doubt."

ing with delight and shouting in a full voice: "I am cured! I am arrival of La Crivotte, who swept in like a whirlwind, almost danc-to her like a whip-stroke lashing her whole body. And now a flaming excitement possessed her; radiant, stamping her feet, she with her consumptive rattle-before she had felt strength returning increed in the icy water for three minutes-all perspiring as she was, pened as she had previously said it would. She had not been im-Father Fourcade's express permission. And then it had all hapand sob in order to prevail upon them to do so, after receiving ed to bathe her, and that she had been obliged to insist and beg And forthwith she began to relate that they had first of all refuscuredl?

"I am cured, my good gentlemen, I am cured!"

Pierre looked at her, this time quite stupefied. Was this the same girl whom, on the previous night, he had seen lying on the

was unable to keep still.

uppnoyed by a determination to live, a joy in living already. face of ashen hue? He could not recognise her as she now stood carriage seat, annihilated, coughing and spitting blood, with her nie to be a very interesting one. We will see." "Centlemen," deelared Doctor Bonamy, "the case appears to case was one of advanced phthisis, complicated by nervous incidents which he read aloud. All three of them agreed in stating that the open before him. Among them were three medical certificates sat down again, he found them under the register which lay these documents were in the "canterbury." At last, when he had began turning everything over; and the superintendent of the piseinas who sat in their midst himself had to get up to see if on the two tables. The young seminarists who acted as secretaries they could not be found among all the papers heaped together Then he asked for the documents concerning La Grivotte. But Finally he turned towards the five-and-twenty or thirty doctors he murmured: "I hear nothing—I hear scarcely anything.", he added: "At least I hear scarcely anything." with, he subjected the patient to a prolonged auscultation. And ensemble of testimony could leave no room for doubt. Forth-Doctor Bonamy wagged his head as though to say that such an which invested it with a peculiar character. who were assembled there in silence. "Will some of you gentle-men," he asked, "kindly lend me the help of your science? We are here to study and discuss these questions."

At first nobody stirred. Then there was one who ventured to come forward and in his turn subject the patient to auscultation. But instead of declaring himself, he continued reflecting, shaking his head anxiously. At last he stammered that in his opinion one must await further developments. Another doctor, however, at once took his place, and this one expressed a decided opinion. He could hear nothing at all, that woman could never have suffered from phthisis. Then others followed him; in fact, with the exception of five or six whose smiling faces remained impenetrable, they all joined the défilé. And the confusion now attained its apogee; for each gave an opinion sensibly differing from that of his colleagues, so that a general uproar arose and one could no longer hear oneself speak. Father Dargeles alone retained the calmness of perfect serenity, for he had scented one of those eases which impassion people and redound to the glory of Our Lady of Lourdes. He was already taking notes on a corner of the table.

Thanks to all the noise of the discussion, Pierre and Doctor Chassaigne, seated at some distance from the others, were now able to talk together without being heard. "Ohl those piseinas!" said the young priest, "I have just seen them. To think that the water should be so seldom changed! What filth it is, what a soup of microbes! What a terrible blow for the present-day mania, that rage for antiseptic precautions! How is it that some pestilence does not carry off all these poor people? The opponents of the microbe theory must be having a good laugh—"

M. Chassaigne stopped him. "No, no, my child," said he.
"The baths may be scarcely clean, but they offer no danger.
Please notice that the temperature of the water never rises above fifty degrees, and that seventy-seven are necessary for the cultivation of germs. Besides, searcely any contagious diseases come to Lourdes, neither cholera, nor typhus, nor variola, nor measles, nor searlatina. We only see certain organic affections here, paralysis, serofula, tumours. ulcers and abscesses, cancers and phthisis; , and the latter cannot be transmitted by the water of the baths. The old sores which are bathed have nothing to fear, and offer no risk of contagion. I can assure you that on this point there is even no necessity for the Blessed Virgin to intervene."

"Then, in that case, doctor," rejoined Pierre, "when you were practising, you would have dipped all your patients in icy water—women at no matter what season, rheumatic patients, people sufforing from diseases of the heart, consumptives, and so on? For which seems to us idiotic and barbarous. Ah! the things we don't under natural conditions, thanks to that immersion in cold water work here, I willingly admit that some cures must take place who have ended by admitting that a supernatural power is at whether, in certain circumstances, it might not save her? bath may undoubtedly kill a consumptive; but do we know which, in practice, one does not date to have recourse. An icy There are heroic methods of treatment to "Certainly not!

&lt;sup>1</sup>The above are Fahrenhelt degrees. In the original the figures are 10 and 25, but these are undoubtedly Centigrade degrees.—Trans.

-would you have bathed her?" instance, that unhappy girl, half dead, and covered with sweat

He did not wish to say any more, but his passion carried him away, so he went on: "I told you that I had become a believerthose laws in medicine? I should like to have them shown to me?" on some bright idea of the doctor's. And so you will understand that all the people who come and discuss here make me laugh when the people who come and discuss here make me laugh when the people who come and discuss of science. Where are Ume always depends on chance, on some fortunate circumstance, begins afresh every time. This is why the practice of medicine remains an art, for there can be no experimental finality in it. may be patients, each liable to variation, so that experimentation the remedy to the ailment, for there are as many cases as there have been studied with the most scrupulous care; but the thing that one does not know, that one cannot know, is the relation of of their evolution; there are remedies also, the effects of which one is thoroughly acquainted, even to the most minnte details opinions clash together? Certainly there are ailments with which edified. Is it not beautiful, all that confusion in which so many Listen for a moment to those gentlemen and you will be he resumed, "but assuredly it is not medicine which will give you deathbed of his wife and daughter. "You ask for certainties," he scorned since it had left him seared and powerless beside the He was relapsing into his anger, his hatred of science, which know, the things we don't know!"

theates from doctors whom nobody knows have no real value. No doubt, too, things are very badly organised here. Those cerillness terminates in a manner which they have not foreseen. medical men are, as a rule, none the less astonished when an should not everything become a miracle? For, after all, whether the action comes from nature or from some unknown power, will be admitted by some, and denied by others. And why then surely cannot do so about an internal lesion the existence of which of treatment. If men cannot agree about a visible sore, they the inevitable battle between contradictory diagnoses and methods and study his miracles. The more doctors that might come, the less likelihood there would be of the truth being established in confinues calling upon doctors in all parts of the world to come this worthy Doctor Bonamy is so little affected, and why he nevertheless, to speak the truth, I understand very well why All documents ought to be stringently inquired into. But even admitting any absolute scientific strictness, you must be very simple, my dear child, if you imagine that a positive conviction would be arrived at, absolute for one and all. Error is implanted in man, and there is no more difficult task than that of demonstrating to universal satisfaction the most insignificant truth."

Pierre had now begun to understand what was taking place at Lourdes, the extraordinary spectacle which the world had been witnessing for years, amidst the devout adoration of some and the insulting laughter of others. Forces as yet but imperfeetly studied, of which one was even ignorant, were certainly at work-auto-suggestion, long-prepared disturbance of the nerves; inspiriting influence of the journey, the prayers and the hymns; and especially the healing breath, the unknown force which was evolved from the multitude, in the acute crisis of faith. Thus it seemed to him anything but intelligent to believe in trickery. The facts were both of a much more lofty and much more simple nature. There was no occasion for the Fathers of the Crotto to descend to falsehood; it was sufficient that they should help in creating confusion, that they should utilise the universal ignorance. It might even be admitted that everybody acted in good faith-the doctors void of genius who delivered the certificates, the consoled patients who believed themselves cured, and the impassioned witnesses who swore that they had beheld what they described. And from all this was evolved the obvious impossibility of proving whether there was a miracle or not. And such being the case, did not the miracle naturally become a reality for the greater number, for all those who suffered and who had need of hope?

Then, as Doctor Bonamy, who had noticed that they were chatting apart, came up to them, Pierre ventured to inquire: "What is about the proportion of the cures to the number of cases?"

"About ten per cent," answered the doctor; and reading in the young priest's eyes the words that he could not utter, he added in a very cordial way: "Oh! there would be many more, they would all be cured if we chose to listen to them. But it is as well to say it, I am only here to keep an eye on the miracles, like a policeman as it were. My only functions are to check excessive zeal, and to prevent holy things from being made ridiculous. In one word, this office is simply an office where a visa is given when the cures have been verified and seem real ones."

He was interrupted, however, by a low growl. Raboin was growing angry: "The cures verified, the cures verified," he muttered. "What is the use of that? There is no pause in the working of the miracles. What is the use of verifying them, so far as believers are concerned? They merely have to bow down and will never be convinced. The work we do here is so much foolbelieve. And what is the use, too, as regards the unbelievers? They

ishness,"

that I won't have you here any longer since you pass your time are a rebel, Raboin," said he; "I shall tell Father Capdebarthe Doctor Bonamy severely ordered him to hold his tongue. "You in sowing disobedience."

possible. If examination once began it must go on, and must, it come and interfere here? By doing so, it simply hampered faith and diminished its own prestige. No, no, there must be no Science, you must throw yourself upon the ground, kiss it and believe. Or else you must take yourself-off. No compromise was believe. Or else you must take yourself-off. attempt to explain the nature of the Divinity. And why should in the ages of real belief Science did not make any meddlesome can a miracle be proved? No, you must believe in it! When Cod is pleased to intervene, it is not for man to try to understand. ings of the pious, and failed to satisfy the incredulous. but well performed—was indeed useless, for it wounded the feel-All the work of the Verification Office-work anything ever his faith was assailed; and Pierre looked at him with symthis man, who so promptly showed his teeth, eager to bite when-Nevertheless, there was truth in what had just been said by uke that of some poor wretch who, after being flung into a river, would doubtless end by bursting forth. His reason was strugging telt a growing discomfort arising within him, a covert anger which only did Pietre notice this among folks of simple, childish minds, illiferate, hallucinated creatures like Raboin, but also among the men of intellect, the men with cultivated brains, the savants like Doctor Bonany and others. It was incredible. And thus fierre falls are accounted to the savants with the men with a savants like the account of the savants like the account of the savants with the tever that nothing henceforth could astonish them. brains. They were evidently living in such a state of visionary telating such imaginings as could only have come from diseased on their faces, their reason never protesting, they went ease and tranquillity. The most stupelying stories left their sere-nity entire. Another miracle and yet another! And with smiles believers present who spoke of the miracles with the most amazing naty conversations which he heard around him. There were some Pierre's greatest sufferings, however, came from the extraorditatally, conduct to doubt.

He glanced at his old friend and saw how sorrowful he looked, reflected that the minds which, like Doctor Chassaigne's, sink at last into blind belief, must pass through this same discomfort and struggle before the final shipwreck. teels the waters seize him from all sides and stille him; and he everything, even if we shall never know everything there quite alone in life. Nevertheless, he was unable to check the cry of protest which rose to his lips: "No no, if we do not know cry of protest which rose to his lips: "No no, if we do not know struck down by destiny, as weak as a crying child, and henceforth is no reason why we should leave off learning. It is wrong that the Unknown should profit by man's debility and ignorance. On the contrary, the eternal hope should be that the things which now seem inexplicable will some day be explained; and we cannot, under healthy conditions, have any other ideal than this march towards the discovery of the unknown, this victory slowly achieved by reason amidst all the miseries both of the flesh and of the mind. Ah! reason-it is my reason which makes me suffer, and it is from my reason too that I await all my strength. When reason dies, the whole being perishes. And I feel but an ardent thirst to satisfy my reason more and more, even though I may lose all happiness in doing so."

Tears were appearing in Doetor Chassaigne's eyes; doubtless the memory of his dear dead ones had again flashed upon him. And, in his turn, he murmured: "Reason, reason, yes, certainly it is a thing to be very proud of; it embodies the very dignity of life. But there is love, which is life's omnipotence, the one bleesing to he was again submitted.

blessing to be won again when you have lost it.

His voice sank in a stifled sob; and as in a mechanical way he began to finger the sets of documents lying on the table, he espied among them one whose cover bore the name of Marie de Guersaint in large letters. He opened it and read the certificates of the two doctors who had inferred that the case was one of paralysis of the marrow. "Come, my child," he then resumed, "I know that you feel warm affection for Mademoiselle de Guersaint. What should you say if she were cured here? There are here some certificates, bearing honourable names, and you know that paralysis of this nature is virtually ineurable. Well, if this young person should all at once run and jump about as I have seen so many others do. would you not feel very happy, would you not at last acknowledge the intervention of a supernatural power?"

Pierre was about to reply, when he suddenly remembered his . consin Beauclair's expression of opinion, the prediction that the miracle would come about like a lightning stroke, an awakening, an exaltation of the whole being; and he felt his discomfort increase and contented himself with replying: "Yes, indeed, I should be very happy. And you are right; there is doubtless only a determination to seeure happiness in all the agitation one beholds here."

However, he could remain in that office no longer. The heat was becoming so great that perspiration streamed down the faces of those present. Doctor Bonamy had begun to dietate a report of the examination of La Grivotte to one of the seminarists, while Father Dargelès, watchful with regard to the expressions employed, occasionally rose and whispered in his car so as to make him modify some sentence. Meantime, the tunnilt around them was continuing; the discussion among the medical men had taken another turn and now bore on certain technical points of no influential writer from Paris, had already gone away, quite vexed longer breathe within those wooden walls, nausea was upsetting every head. The little fair-haired gentleman, the significance with regard to the case in question. You could no at not having seen a real miracle.

Pierre thereupon said to Doctor Chassaigne, "Let us go; I touch her. And she, with her empurpled cheeks, her flaming eyes, her dancing gait, could do nothing but repeat, "I am cured, and all were struggling to see the chosen one, question her and for the report of the miracle must have already spread, and one crowd, which was eager to behold the girl so miraculously healed; they found themselves caught in a torrential, surging, jostling at last being dismissed. And as soon as they reached the door They left the office at the same time as La Crivotte, who was shall be taken ill if I stay here any longer."

ed the Commander, one of whose manias was to come down to the piscinas and the Crotto in order to vent his anger there. With deavoured to extricate her from the crush. They had just perceivshe suddenly, reappeared close to Pierre and the doctor, who enof her as though she had sunk in those tumultuous waters; then off amidst the eddies of the throng. For a moment one lost sight Shouts drowned her voice, she herself was submerged, carried I am cured!"

amidst the wild enthusiasm of the crowd, "I am cured, I am cured!" "Well!" he cried, seized with sudden fury, "so much the worse Unvotte, pushing him aside in order that she might pass, repeated And his face reddened and his eyes flashed with anger when La ging his left leg, which his second attack of paralysis had stiffened. his frock-coat tightly girding him in military fashion, he was, as usual, leaning on his silver-knobbed walking-stick, slightly drag-compassion for our sufferings by elleristing that it is in the you yourself ought to list of the you yourself ought to less or it is restore to you the use of your fall has gai troit as fall is the interest in the interest and Abbe Judaine, who was passing, had to entrieste him irom his trouble. The priest drew him away. "Be quiet," he said. "It is scandalous. Why do you recell the this against the goodness of God who consciously from the ground with the composeion for our entrement. once rather than suffer again, people began to growd around iting nor fortune, and that this girl ought to have preferred to die at pitiful to desire life when one was possessed of neither bearing when he began stammering confused words, saying that it was and his maniacal passion for death was forgiven him. However, Exclamations arose, folks began to laugh, for he was well known, day I die. Show myzell es spinitees, es coneacty es the transande "ask to live for another ten years, when my teach for you live for The Commander almost choked with angus, "linest" in period, of patients whom I see pass along here, full of a base terror of death, shricking aloud their weakness, their passion to remain alive! Ahl no, I should feel too much contempt for myself. I want to diel—to die at onec! It will be so delightful to be no more."

"llug ym "vov roi

He was at last out of the seramble of the pilgrims, and again found himself near Doctor Chassaigne and Pierre on the bank of the Gave. And he addressed himself to the doctor, whom he often met: "Didn't they try to restore a dead man to life just now?" he asked; "I was told of it—it almost suffocated me. Eh, doctor? you understand? That man was happy enough to be dead, and they dared to dip him in their water in the criminal hope of making him live again! But suppose they had succeeded, suppose their water had animated that poor devil once more—for one never knows what may happen in this funny world—don't you think that the man would have had a perfect right to spit his anger in the face of those corpsemenders? Had he asked them to awaken him? How did they know if he were not well pleased at being dead? Folks ought to be consulted at any rate. Just picture them playing the same vile trick on me when I at last fall into the great deep sleep. Ahl I would give them a nice reception. 'Meddle with what concerns you,' I should say, and you may be sure I should make all haste to die again!"

He looked so singular in the fit of rage which had come over him that Abbé Judaine and the doctor could not help smiling. Pierre, however, remained grave, chilled by the great quiver which swept by. Were not those words he had just heard the despairing imprecations of Lazarus? He had often imagined Lazarus emerging from the tomb and erying aloud: "Why hast Thou again awakened me to this abominable life, O Lord? I was sleeping the eternal, dreamless sleep so deeply; I was at last enjoying such sweet repose amidst the delights of Nihility! I had known every wretchedness and every dolour, treachery, vain hope, defeat, sickness; as one of the living I had paid my frightful debt to suffering, for I was born without knowing why, and I lived without knowing how; and now, behold, O Lord, Thou requirest me to pay my debt yet again; Thou condemnest me to serve my term of punishment afresh! Have I then been guilty of some inexpiable transgression that thou shouldst inflict such cruel chastisement upon me? Alas! to live again, to fcel oneself die a little in one's ficsh each day, to have no intelligence save such as is required in order to doubt; no will, save such as one must have to be unable; no tenderness, save such as is needed to weep over one's own sorrows. Yet it was past, I had erossed the terrifying threshold of death, I had known that second which is so horrible that it sufficeth to poison the whole of life. I had felt the sweat of agony cover me with moisture, the blood flow back from my limbs, my breath forsake me, flee away in a last gasp. And Thou ordainest that I should know this distress a

O Lord restore unto me the slumber I have earned, and let me greatest example of Thy wrath, a cause of terror unto all genera-tions. But show unto me Thy gentleness and loving kindness, and served Thee; and I beseech Thee do not make of me the hast never inflieted it on any being. I have always loved Thee merey upon me, and forbear from inflicting on me the torture of living yet again; that torture which is so frightful that Thou suffering from the interruption of any eternal slumber. lay myself down in this grave, and again fall asleep without exceed that of all mankind. Then may it be even now, O Lordl Yes, I entreat Thee, do also this great miracle; may I onco more second time, that I should die twice, that my human misery should spoke of their projected trip to the Cirque de Cavarnie. of faith imparted to some women's countenances, and they also and was quite enlivened by his good nap. He and his com-panion were admiring the extraordinary beauty which the fervour behalf, the favour of finding some wealthy person who would provide him with the million of france that he needed for his ardour for his daughter's cure, and then he solicited, on his own devoutly fell upon his knees. At first he prayed with passionate so wante amid the radiance of the tapers. And whilst Pierre stood waiting to take her back to the Hospital, M. de Guereaint devoutly fell meet her back to the Hospital, M. de and then again turned them upon the marble statue which looked She did not answer the loving words which her larke, distressful eyes, to her, but simply glanced at him with her larke, distressful eyes, still fixed on the Blessed Virgin who had not deigned to hear her, no effect, M. de Guersaint at once followed Pictre. They found the poor girl still in the same painful supor, with her eyes On learning, however, that Marie had taken a lirst bath with studies on aerial navigation.

He and his com-M, de Guersaint, who had only just left his room at the hotel, waiting for him. On his way back to the Grotto, however, he encountered the Abbe Des Hermoises deep in conversation with lecting that it was past five o'clock, and that Marie must be While Pierre was pondering in this wise, Abbe Judaine lad led the Commander away, at last managing to calm him; and now the young priest shook hands with Doctor Chassaigne, recolsleep once more amid the delights of Thy nihility."

Λ

BERNYDELLES LEIVES

toom at the Hotel of the Appanitions, it occurred to Pears to About eleven o'eleck that night, leaving M. de Cuersaint in his return for a moment to the Hospital of Our Lady of Dolours before going to bed himself. He had left Marie in such a despairing state, so fiercely silent, that he was full of anxicty about her. And when he had asked for Madame de Jonquière at the door of the Sainte-Honorine Ward he became yet more anxious, for the news was by no means good. The young girl, said the Superintendent, had not even opened her mouth. She would answer nobody, and had even refused to eat. Madame de Jonquière insisted therefore that Pierre should come in. True, the presence of men was forbidden in the women's wards at night-time, but then a priest is not a man.

"She only cares for you and will only listen to you," said the worthy lady. "Pray come in and sit down near her till Abbé Judaine arrives. He will come at about one in the morning to administer the communion to our more afflicted sufferers, those who cannot move and who have to eat at daybreak. You will be able to assist him."

Pierre thereupon followed Madame de Jonquière, who installed him at the head of Marie's bed. "My dear child," she said to the girl, "I have brought you somebody who is very fond of you. You will be able to chat with him, and you will be reasonable now, won't you?"

Marie, however, on recognising Pierre, gazed at him with an air of exasperated suffering, a black, stern expression of revolt.

"Would you like him to read something to you," resumed Madame de Jonquière, "something that would ease and console you, as he did in the train? No? It wouldn't interest you, you don't care for it? Well, we will see by-and-by. I will leave him with you, and I am sure you will be quite reasonable again in a

Pierre then began speaking to her in a low voice, saying all the kind, consoling things that his heart could think of, and entreating her not to allow herself to sink into such despair. If the Blessed Virgin had not eured her on the first day, it was because she reserved her for some conspicuous miracle. But he spoke in vain. Marie had turned her head away, and did not even seem to listen as she lay there with a bitter expression on her mouth and a gleam of irritation in her eyes which wandered away into space. Accordingly he ceased speaking and began to gaze at the ward around him.

The spectacle was a frightful one. Never before had such a nausea of pity and terror affected his heart. They had long since dined, nevertheless plates of food which had been brought up from the kitchens still lay about the beds; and all through the night there were some who ate whilst others continued restlessly moaning, asking to be turned over or helped out of bed. As the hours went by a kind of vague delirium seemed to come upon almost all of them. Very few were able to sleep quietly. Some had been un-from that moment neither moan nor call, indeed no sound whatever, could waken, her. amidst her lovely, wavy fair hair, which was all in disorder. And soundly asleep, her pretty head sinking on one of her shoulders stetched herself in the ann-chair for a moment's rest, she fell there o'clock, she was all at once overpowered. Having imprudently slipped pillows behind them. However, shortly after eleven ams around patients to hold them up, whilst Madame de Jonquière coming and going, bringing and emptying basins, and passing her lend a helping hand. In Paris she would have rung for a servant rather than have moved a candlestick herself, but here she was ever hastened to every patient whom she heard calling, ever ready to her legs and arms aching, though she would not admit it, but exertion exhausted her. She herself, however, at last began to feel person had no business to offer to nurse the sick when the slightest neaux in quite a temper; for, as she sensibly enough remarked, a plain of a frightful headache. And this had put Madame Désag-Volmar, she had not even shown herself; but it was alleged that Madame de Jonquière had sent her to bed on hearing her comried, you know, and I'm very fond of my husband." As for Madame responded, with an air of scared surprise: "Ohl I can't, I'm marher with a smile: "Why don't you take the yous?" whereupon she who displayed such enthusiastic zeal that Sister Hyacinthe asked in it for a moment without being disturbed. It must be admitted that she was bravely seconded by little Madame Désagneaux, had an arm-chair in which to rest herself, but she never sat down Madame de Jonquière, taking her functions to heart, did not close her eyes during the three nights spent at Lourdes. She certainly garrets reserved to the Sisters of the Hospital, For her own part, had come to kiss her mother, before going to sleep in one of the However, Pierre recognised Haymonde, who, her duties over, ferno, amidst the nocturnal agony of all the accumulated suffering. Night-mare-like shadows and cries sped to and fro, peopling this incame in through the two windows which had been left afar. instead of any freshness, merely the heavy hear of the August might campment of dying women, in which a sickly smell prevailed; for, old baskets, boxes, and valises. Indeed, you no longer knew where to step. Two smoky lanterns shed but a dim light upon this enand on all sides there was a confused litter of ragged garments, ses filling the central space, some fresh pallets had been added, To the fifteen beds ranged along the walls and the seven mattresmoreover, the obstruction of the ward seemed to have increased. during the five days of the pilgrimage. In the semi-obscurity, get their clothes off that they did not even change their linen er were simply stretched out on the beds, it being so difficult to dressed and were lying between the sheets, but the greater numb-

Madame de Jonquière, however, had softly approached th

sending for Monsieur Ferrand, the house-surgeon, you know, who accompanies us. He would have given the poor girl something to calm her. Only he is busy downstairs trying to relieve Brother Isidore, in the Family Ward. Besides, as you know, we are not supposed to give medical attendance here; our work consists in placing our dear sick oncs in the hands of the Blessed Virgin."

Sister Hyacinthe, who had made up her mind to spend the night with the Superintendent, now drew near. "I have just come from the Family Ward," she said; "I went to take Monsieur Sabathier some oranges which I had promised him, and I saw Monsieur Ferrand, who had just succeeded in reviving Brother Isidore. Would you like me to go down and fetch him?"

But Pierre declined the offer. "No, no," he replied, "Marie will be sensible. I will read her a few consoling pages by-and-by, and then she will rest.'

For the moment, however, the girl still remained obstinately silent. One of the two lanterns was hanging from the wall elose by, and Pierre could distinctly see her thin face, rigid and motionless, like stone. Then, farther away, in the adjoining bed, he perceived Elise Rouquet, who was sound asleep and no longer wore her fichu, but openly displayed her face, the ulceration of which still continued to grow paler. And on the young priest's left hand was Madame Vêtu, now greatly weakened, in a hopcless state, unable to doze off for a moment, shaken as she was by a continuous rattle. He said a few kind words to her, for which she thanked him with a nod; and, gathering her remaining strength together, she was at last able to say: "There were several cures to-day; I was very pleased to hear of them."

On a mattress at the foot of her bed was La Grivotte, who in a fever of extraordinary activity kept on sitting up to repeat her favourite phrase: "I am cured. I am cured." And she went on to relate that she had eaten half a fowl for dinner, she who had been unable to eat for long months past. Then, too, she had followed the torehlight procession on foot during nearly a couple of hours, and she would certainly have danced till daybreak had the Blessed Virgin only been pleased to give a ball. And once more she repeated: "I am eured, yes, cured, quite cured."

Thereupon Madame Vêtu found enough strength to say with

childlike serenity and perfect, gladsome abnegation: "The Blessed Virgin did well to cure her since she is poor. I am better pleased than if it had been myself, for I have my little shop to depend upon and can wait. We each have our turn, each our turn.

One and all displayed a like charity, a like pleasure that others should have been cured. Seldom, indeed, was any jealousy shown; they surrendered themselves to a kind of epidemical beatitude, to a contagious hope that they would all be cured whenever it should so please the Blessed Virgin. And it was necessary that she should not be offended by any undue impatience; for unless it were her design to grant some chosen one immediate her tum; the Blessed Virgin forgot none of her dear daughters however, said her neighbours in the ward, Each indeed had prought to the Hospital on a stretcher she had died there, cured, distance when she had staggered, panting and livid, and on being return to the Crotto on toot. But she had gone only halt the back to the Hospital had asked to be set down that she might to take a tew steps at the Crotto, and who while being conveyed farm servant, who with extraordinary strength of will had contrived mained unshakeable. A story was told of a paralytic woman, some of the one which would be worked on themselves. Their faith reever despaired, each fresh miracle was the promise of another one, patients prayed for the cure of their neighbours. None of them born of common suffering and hope, the most grievously afflicted by healing some rather than others. Thus, with the traternity assuredly she had her reasons and knew right well why she began the suffering being who can no longer wait. Such was her despair, her, a collapse of faith, a sudden loss of courage, all the rage of that awful room, She had experienced what seldom happened to her rebellion in a low, terrible voice, amidst the vague shadows of again offering her read to her, Marie burst into furious sobs. All at once, at the moment when Pierre was leaning towards her, admission into Paradise.

would grant my prayer, I had prayed to her so fervently. I shall "No, no," she stammered, "the Virgin is cruel; she is unjust, for she did not cure me just now. Yet I felt so certain that she indeed, that she even became sacrilegious.

not want to speak-and oh! prevent me, for my heart is too full, never be cured, now that the first day is past. It was a Saturday, and I was convinced that I should be cured on a Saturday. I did and I might say more than I ought to do."

the in the street, where the passers-by, at least, will take pity on me away, carry me away in your arms, so that I may go and she does not hear when one speaks to her and sobs. If you only knew all that I said to her! Ohl I want to go away at once. Take all falsehoods; there is nothing, she does not even exist, since her, no longer believe in her. The tales which are related here are should stifle, I must speak out," she said. "I no longer love But in spite of her efforts she was unable to keep silence. quiet Marie, I entreat youl It would never do for any one to hear you-you so pious! Do you want to scandalise every soul?" and he was endeavouring to stifle the cry of her rebellion. With fraternal hands he had quickly taken hold of her head, back, stammering, talking childishly. "Besides, nobody loves me", she said. "My father was not even there. And you, my friend, She was growing weak again, and had once more fallen on her forsook me, When I saw that it was another who was taking me to the piscinas, I began to feel a chill. Yes, that chill of doubt which I often felt in Paris. And that is at least certain, I doubted perhaps, indeed, that is why she did not cure me. I cannot have prayed well enough, I am not pious enough, no doubt.'

"Jegaringsl"

She was no longer blaspheming, but seeking for excuses to explain the non-intervention of Heaven. However, her face retained an angry expression amidst this struggle which she was waging with the supreme power, that power which she had loved so well and entreated so fervently, but which had not obeyed her. When, on rare occasions, a fit of rage of this description broke out in the ward, and the sufferers, lying on their beds, rebelled against their fate, sobbing and lamenting, and at times even swearing, the lady-hospitallers and the Sisters, somewhat shocked, would content themselves with simply closing the bed-curtains. Grace had departed, one must await its return. And at last, sometimes after long hours, the rebellious complaints would die away, and peace would reign again amidst the deep, woeful silence.

"Calm yourself, calm yourself, I implore you," Pierre gently repeated to Marie, seeing that a fresh attack was coming upon her, an attack of doubt in herself, of fear that she was unworthy of the divine assistance.

Sister-Hyacinthe, moreover, had again drawn near. "You will not be able to take the sacrament by-and-by, my dear child," said she, "if you continue in such a state. Come, since we have given Monsieur l'Abbé permission to read to you, why don't you let him do so?"

Marie made a feeble gesture as though to say that she consented, and Pierre at once took out of the valise at the foot of her bed, the little blue-covered book in which the story of Bernadette was so naïvely related. As on the previous night, however, when the train was rolling on, he did not confine himself to the bald phraseology of the book, but began improvising, relating all manner of details in his own fashion, in order to charm the simple folks who listened to him. Nevertheless, with his reasoning, analytical proclivities, he could not prevent himself from secretly reestablishing the real facts, imparting, for himself alone, a human character to this legend, whose wealth of prodigies contributed so greatly to the cure of those that suffered. Women were soon sitting up on all the surrounding beds. They wished to hear the continuation of the story, for the thought of the sacrament which they were passionately awaiting had prevented almost all of them from getting to sleep. And seated there, in the pale light of the lantern hanging from the wall above him, Pierre little by little raised his voice, so that he might be heard by the whole ward. "The persecutions began with the very first prevents."

"The persecutions began with the very first miracles. Called a liar and a lunatic, Bernadette was threatened with imprisonment. Abbé Peyramale, the parish priest of Lourdes, and Monseigneur

Laurence, Bishop of Tarbes, like the rest of the clergy, refrained from all intervention waiting the course of events with the greatest prudence; whilst the civil authorities, the Prefect, the Public Prosecutor, the Mayor, and the Commissary of Police, indulged in prosecutor, the Mayor, and the larger numbers, the Wirgin to a stranger at voice exhibiting the world no for the Wirgin to a stranger of penitence; a spring graining for the constitution of the crowds the crowds the crowds the crowds the constitution of the crowds th over, it was ever the same adventure beginning afresh: an appanwhom is ever arising from generation to generation. And, morethe elemal Messiah whem the nations await, and the need of folks rushed forward to kies her garments. She was a Messiah, minimu of fervour spread: "Here is the saint, the saint, the saint," installing thenselves there, jostling one another that they might lose nothing of the specteciel As soon as Bernadette appeared, a grew larger each morning, and thousands of people ended by to her enraptured gaze. The crowd on the banks of the Gave chosen, and who became so beautiful when the heavens opened wished to see the plessed child whom the Queen of the Angels had people flocked into Lourdes that the town quite overflowed. All It is she, the Blessed Virgin." On the first market-day, so many had not yet told her name, she was recognised, and people said, lages, the towns, spoke of Bernadette alone. Although the Lady The neighbouring valleys, the vilembrace the whole horizon. and made the sign of the cross, with gestures which seemed to whole person became majestic; it was in a slow, stately way that whilst her parted lips burnt with divine love. And then her teatures seemed to ascend, her eyes were bathed with light, human beauty during her crises of ecstasy. Her brow beamed, her visionary, the saint, her face assuming an expression of superand good faith, amidst all her sufferings. And she was truly the of the first apparitions, so candid, so charming, in her ignorance a short distance backward and he beheld Bernadette at the time use up betore him with invincible force. His mind travelled Continuing his perusal in this fashion, Pierre saw the real story excessive anti-religious zeal."

Ahl those first mireoles of Loundes, which a springfide flowering of consolation and hope they incrude, which is the hearts of the wretched upon whom poverty and softmen were prepared to little Pourient's recruitation in the iey water, the deal recovering their beating, the lane anddenly enabled to walk, and so many chier cear, bisine Mannah, benade Sculites, walk, and so many chier cear, bisine Mannah, benade Sculites, Auguste Borden, Blaireite Sculeme, Pencite Cawsux, in turn Auguste Borden, Blaireite Sculeme, Pencite Cawsux, in turn cured of the most dreadful almenty, became the ministry of each cured of the most dreadful almenty, became the ministry of each

no ration ratio of the stoke W to estimate as an an estimate blo nabora-bad se-estimate an estimate at the state of the common of the control of the state of the control o

less conversations, and fanned the illusions of all those who suffered either in their hearts or their flesh. On Thursday, March 4, the last day of the fifteen visits solicited by the Virgin, there were more than twenty thousand persons assembled before the Grotto. Everybody, indeed, had come down from the mountains. this immense throng found at the Grotto the divine food that it hungered for, a feast of the Marvellous, a sufficient meed of the Impossible to content its belief in a superior power, which deigned to bestow some attention upon poor folks, and to intervene in the wretched affairs of this lower world, in order to re-establish some measure of justice and kindness. It was, indeed, the cry of heavenly charity bursting forth, the invisible helping hand stretched out at last to dress the eternal sores of humanity. Ah! that dream in which each successive generation sought refuge, with what indestructible energy did it not arise among the disinherited oncs of this world as soon as it found a favourable spot, prepared by circumstances! And for centuries, perhaps, circumstances had never so combined to kindle the mystical fire of faith as they did at Lourdes.

A new religion was about to be founded, and persecutions at once began, for religions only spring up amidst vexations and rebellions. And even as it was long ago at Jerusalem, when the tidings of miracles spread, the civil authorities-the Public Prosecutor, the Justice of the Pcace, the Mayor, and particularly the Prefect of Tarbes—were all roused and began to bestir themselves. The Prefect was a sincere Catholic, a worshipper, a man of perfect honour, but he also had the firm mind of a public func-tionary, was a passionate defender of order, and a declared adversary of fanaticism, which gives birth to disorder and religious perversion. Under his orders at Lourdes there was a Commissary of Police, a man of great intelligence and shrewdness, who had hitherto discharged his functions in a very proper way, and who, legitimately enough, beheld in this affair of the apparitions an opportunity to put his gift of sagacious skill to the proof. So the struggle began, and it was this Commissary who, on the first Sunday in Lent, at the time of the first apparitions, summoned Bernadette to his office in order that he might question her. He showed himself affectionate, then angry, then threatening, but all in vain; the answers which the girl gave him were ever the same. The story which she related, with its slowly accumulated details, had little by little irrevocably implanted itself in her infantile mind. And it was no lie on the part of this poor suffering creature, this exceptional victim of hysteria, but an unconscious haunting, radical lack of will-power to free herself from her original hallucination. She knew not how to exert any such will, she could not, she would not exert it. Ahl the poor child, the dear child, so amiable and so gentle, so incapable of any evil thought, from that time forward lost to life, crucified by her fixed idea, whence one could only have extricated her by changing her environment, by restoring her to the open air, in some land of daylight and human affection. But she was the chosen one, she had beheld the Virgin, she would suffer from it her whole life had beheld the Virgin, and die from it at last long, and die from it at lastly pierre, who knew Bernadette so well, and who felt a fraternal pity for her memory, the fervent compassion with which one regards a human saint, a simple, upright, charming creature tortured by her faith, allowed his emotion to appear in his moist weeks and trembling voice. And a pause in his narrative ensued. Alarie, who had hitherto been lying there quite stiff, with a hard expression of revolt still upon her face, opened her clenched hands and made a vague gesture of pity. "Ah," she murmured, "the poor child, all alone to contend against those magistrates, and so innocent, so proud, so unshakeable in her championship of so innocent, so proud, so unshakeable in her championship of so innocent, so proud, so unshakeable in her championship of the truth!"

The same compassionate sympathy was arising from all the beds in the ward. That hospital inferno, with its nocturnal wretchenes, its pestilential atmosphere, its pallets of anguish heaped bygcher, its weary lady-hospitallers and Sisters flitting phantom-like hither and thither, now seemed to be illumined by a ray of divine charity. Was not the eternal illusion of happiness rising once more amidst tears and unconscious falsehoods? Poor, poor Bernadettel All waxed indignant at the thought of the persecutions which she had endured in defence of her faith.

near at hand. However, they did her no good. And no sooner had the returned to Lourdes than the torture of being questioned and adored by a whole people began afresh, became aggravated, decided to take her to the baths of Cauterets, which were so of others, and she herself had not been cured, it was very sensibly Virgin seemed to have chosen her solely to work the happiness and was with difficulty taught to read and write. As the Blessed aged in the town asylum, and there she made her first communion. confinement in a hospital at Tarbes. But public exasperation was feared. A bishop had fallen on his knees before her. Some ladies had sought to buy favours from her for gold. Moreover, she had found a refuge with the Sisters of Nevers, who tended the and found a refuge with the Sisters of Nevers, who tended the might have induced visions. This nearly led to her removal and asthma was a sure sign, and which, in certain circumstances, honest opinion that it was a case of nervous trouble, of which the the girl came, like all doctors would have done, to the doctors who were sent by the Prefect to make a careful examinathe common sense of all the civil authorities put together. from her. But the obstinacy of her dream was stronger than magistracy pursued her, and endeavoured to wring a retractation had to appear before the judges of the local tribunal. The entire had to suffer. After being questioned by the Commissary she Then Pierre, resuming his story, related all that the child had tions which she had endured in defence of her faith. and filled her more and more with horror of the world. Her life was over already; she would be a playful child no more; she could never be a young girl dreaming of a husband, a young wife kissing the cheeks of sturdy children. She had beheld the Virgin, she was the chosen one, the martyr. If the Virgin, said believers, had confided three secrets to her, investing her with a triple armour as it were, it was simply in order to sustain her in her appointed course: ·The clergy had for a long time remained aloof, on its own side full of doubt and anxiety. Abbé Pcyramalc, the parish priest of Lourdes, was a man of somewhat blunt ways, but full of infinite kindness, rectitude, and energy whenever he found himself in what he thought the right path. On the first occasion when Bernadette visited him, he received this child, who had been brought up at Bartrès and had not yet been seen at Catechism, almost as sternly as the Commissary of Police had done; in fact, he refused to believe her story, and with some irony told her to entreat the Lady to begin by making the eglantine blossom beneath her feet, which, by the way, the Lady never did. And if the Abbé ended by taking the child under his protection like a good pastor who defends his flock, it was simply through the advent of persecution and the talk of imprisoning this puny child, whose clear eyes shone so frankly, and who clung with such modest. gentle stubbornness to her original tale. Besides, why should he have continued denying the miracle after merely doubting it like a prudent priest who had no desire to see religion mixed up in any suspicious affair? Holy Writ is full of prodigies, all dogma is based on the mysterious; and that being so, there was nothing to prevent him, a priest, from believing that the Virgin had really entrusted Bernadette with a pious message for him, an injunction to build a church whither the faithful would repair in procession. Thus it was that he began loving and defending Bernadette for her charm's sake, whilst still refraining from active interference, awaiting as he did the decision of his Bishop.

This Bishop, Monseigneur Laurence, seemed to have shut himself up in his episcopal residence at Tarbes, locking himself within it and preserving absolute silence as though there were nothing occurring at Lourdes of a nature to interest him. He had given strict instructions to his clergy, and so far not a priest had appeared among the vast crowds of people who spent their days before the Grotto. He waited, and even allowed the Prefect to state in his administrative circulars that the civil and the religious authorities were acting in concert. In reality, he cannot have believed in the apparitions of the Grotto of Massabielle, which he doubtless considered to be the mere hallucinations of a sick child. This affair, which was revolutionising the region, was of sufficient importance for him to have had it studied day by day, and the manner in which he disregarded it for so long

ing would suffice to stay the poor people who hungered for illusion

and hope.

But as soon as the new religion was proscribed, forbidden by the law as an offence, it began to burn with an inextinguishable flame in the depths of every soul. The believers came to the river bank in far greater numbers, fell upon their knees at a short distanee from the Grotto, and sobbed aloud as they gazed at the forbidden heaven. And the siek, the poor ailing folks, who were forbidden to seek eure, rushed on the Grotto despite all prohibitions, slipped in wherever they could find an aperture or elimbed over the palings when their strength enabled them to do so, in the one ardent desire to steal a little of the water. What there was a prodigious water in that Grotto, which restored the sight of the blind, which set the infirm erect upon their legs again, which instantaneously healed all ailments: and there were officials eruel enough to put that water under lock and key so that it might not cure any more poor people! Why, it was monstrous! And a cry of hatred arose from all the humble ones, all the disinherited ones, who had as much need of the Marvellous as of bread to live! In accordance with a municipal decree, the names of all delinquents were to be taken by the police, and thus one soon beheld a woeful défilé of old women and lame men summoned before the Justice of the Peace for the sole offence of taking a little water from the fount of life! They stammered and entreated, at their wit's end when a fine was imposed upon And, outside, the crowd was growling; rageful unpopularity was gathering around those magistrates who treated human wretchedness so harshly, those pitiless masters who, after taking all the wealth of the world, would not even leave to the poor their dream of the realms beyond, their belief that a beneficent superior power took a maternal interest in them, and was ready to endow them with peace of soul and health of body. One day a whole band of poverty-stricken and ailing folks went to the Mayor, knelt down in his courtyard, and implored him with sobs to allow the Grotto to be reopened; and the words they spoke were so pitiful that all who heard them wept. A mother showed her child who was half dead; would they let the little one die like that in her arms when there was a source yonder which had saved the children of other mothers? A blind man called attention to his dim eyes; a pale, serofulous youth displayed the sores on his legs; a paralytic woman sought to join her woeful twisted hands: did the authorities wish to see them all perish, did they refuse them the last divine chance of life, condemned and abandoned as they were by the science of man? And equally great was the distress of the believers. of those who were convinced that a corner of Heaven had opened amidst the night of their mournful existences, and who were indignant that they should be deprived of the chimerical delight, the supreme relief for their human and social sufferings which they found in the belief that the Blessed Virgin had indeed come down from Heaven to bring them the priceless balm of her intervention. However, the Mayor was unable to promise anything, and the crowd withdrew weeping, ready for rebellion, as though under the blow of some great act of injustice, an act of idiotic cruelty towards the humble and the simple for which of idiotic cruelty towards the humble and the simple for which to good order and healthiness of mind. attacks of religious hallucination are condemned as prejudicial of a well-regulated society in which the ever-recurring epidemical joy, was destined to sweep aside the rigid, morose conceptions burning desire of the multitude, the holy madness of the universal Mother, to die only to awaken in heavent And necessarily the Ohl to cease suffering, to secure equality in the comforts of an enthusiastic desire for cure both in this world and in the reason; whereas the need of happiness carried the people off into quired order, the respect of a discreet religion, the triumph of consolation for their present wretchedness. The authorities refrom the mystic glimpse of future happiness in which they found dreamland to be closed upon them, who would not be shut off vith the best intentions and contending against the ever-swelling Prefect, and the Commissary of Police-presented, all animated traordinary spectacle which these sensible men-the Minister, the The struggle went on for several months; and it was an ex-

Heaven would assuredly take vengeance.

The Sainte-Honorine Ward, on hearing the story, likewise revolted. Pierre again had to pause, for many were the stilled exclamations in which the Commissary of Police was likened to Satan and Herod. La Grivotte had sat up on her mattress, stammering: "Ahl the monsters! To behave like that to the Blessed Virgin who

who has cured mel"

And even Madame Vêtu—once more pencirated by a ray of hope amidst the covert certainty slie felt that she was going to die—grew angry at the idea that the Grotto would not have existed had the Prefect won the day. "There would have been no pilgrinates," she said, "we should not be here, hundreds of us would not be cured every year."

A fit of stilling came over her, however, and Sister Hyacinthe had to raise her to, a sitting posture. Madame de Jonquiète was profiting by the interruption to attend to a young woman afflicted with a spinal complaint, whilst two other women, unable to with short, silent steps, looking quite white in the misty darkness. And from the far end of the ward, where all was black, there resounded a noise of painful breathing, which had been going on vitiout a pause, accompanying Pierre's narrative like a rattle. Vitiout a pause, accompanying Pierre's narrative like a rattle. Elise Ronquet alone was sleeping peacefully, still stretched upon belies Ronquet alone was sleeping peacefully, still stretched upon

ing would suffice to stay the poor people who hungered for illusion

and hope.

160

But as soon as the new religion was proscribed, forbidden by the law as an offence, it began to burn with an inextinguishable flame in the depths of every soul. The believers came to the river bank in far greater numbers, fell upon their knees at a short distance from the Grotto, and sobbed aloud as they gazed at the forbidden heaven. And the sick, the poor ailing folks, who were forbidden to seek cure, rushed on the Grotto despite all prohibitions, slipped in wherever they could find an aperture or climbed over the palings when their strength cnabled them to do so, in the one ardent desire to steal a little of the water. What! there was a prodigious water in that Grotto, which restored the sight of the blind, which set the infirm erect upon their legs again, which instantaneously healed all ailments: and there were officials cruel enough to put that water under lock and key so that it might not cure any more poor people! Why, it was monstrous! And a cry of hatred arose from all the humble ones, all the disinherited ones, who had as much need of the Marvellous as of bread to live! In accordance with a municipal decree, the names of all delinquents were to be taken by the police, and thus one soon beheld a woeful defile of old women and lame men summoned before the Justice of the Peace for the sole offence of taking a little water from the fount of life! They stammered and entreated, at their wit's end when a fine was imposed upon And, outside, the crowd was growling; rageful unpopularity was gathering around those magistrates who treated human wretchedness so harshly, those pitiless masters who, after taking all the wealth of the world, would not even leave to the poor their dream of the realms beyond, their belief that a beneficent superior power took a maternal interest in them, and was ready to endow them with peace of soul and health of body. One day a whole band of poverty-stricken and ailing folks went to the Mayor, knelt down in his courtyard, and implored him with sobs to allow the Grotto to be reopened; and the words they spoke were so pitiful that all who heard them wept. A mother showed her child who was half dead; would they let the little one die like that in her arms when there was a source yonder which had saved the children of other mothers? A blind man called attention to his dim eyes; a pale, scrofulous youth displayed the sores on his legs; a paralytic woman sought to join her woeful twisted hands: did the authorities wish to see them all perish, did they refuse them the last divine chance of life, condemned and abandoned as they were by the science of man? And equally great was the distress of the believers. of those who were convinced that a corner of Heaven had opened amidst the night of their mournful existences, and who were indignant that they should be deprived of the chimerical delight, the supreme relief for their human and social sufferings which they found in the belief that the Blessed Virgin had indeed of idiotic cruelty towards the humble and the simple for which as though under the blow of some great act of injustice, an act anything, and the erowd withdrew weeping, ready for rebellion, her intervention. However, the Mayor was unable to promise come down from Heaven to bring them the prieeless balin of attacks, of religious hallucination are condemned as prejudicial of a well-regulated society in which the ever-recurring epidentical joy, was destined to sweep aside the rigid, morose conceptions burning desire of the multitude, the holy madness of the universal the protection of a just and beneficent Mother, to die only to awaken in heaven! And necessarily the Mother, to die only to awaken in heaven! And necessarily the puring desire of the multitude, the holy madness of the universal On to cease suffering, to seeme equality in the comforts of an enthusiastic desire for eure both in this world and in the reason; whereas the need of happiness earried the people off into quired order, the respect of a discreet religion, the triumph of consolation for their present wretchedness. The authorities refrom the mystic glimpse of future happiness in which they found dreamland to be closed upon them, who would not be shut off crowd of despairing ones, who would not allow the doors of with the best intentions and contending against the ever-swelling Prefeet, and the Commissary of Police-presented, all animated traordinary spectaele which these sensible men-the Minister, the The struggle went on for several months; and it was an ex-

Heaven would assuredly take vengeance.

who has cured mel" To behave like that to the Blessed Virgin who "Ahl the monstersl and Herod. La Crivotte had sat up on her mattress, stammering: mations in which the Commissary of Police was likened to Satan volted. Pierre again had to pause, for many were the stilled exela-The Sainte-Honorine Ward, on hearing the story, likewise reto good order and healthiness of mind.

And even Madaine Vêtu-onee more penctrated by a ray of mages," she said, "we should not be here, hundreds of us would had the Prefect won the day. "There would have been no pilgri--grew angry at the idea that the Crotto would not have existed hope amidst the covert certainty she telt that she was going to die

not be cured every year."

ruse Ronquet alone was sleeping peacefully, still strete! without a pause, accompanying Pierre's narrative fike And from the far end of the ward, where all was black, there resonnded a noise of painful breathing, which had been going on with short, silent steps, looking quite white in the misty darkness. remain on their beds, so unbearable was the heat, prowled about with a spinal complaint, whilst two other women, unable to profiting by the interruption to attend to a young woman afflicted had to raise her to a sitting posture. Madame de Jonquière was A fit of stilling came over her, however, and Sister Hyacinthe her back, and displaying her disfigured countenance, which was slowly drying.

Midnight had struck a quarter of an hour previously, and Abbé Judaine might arrive at any moment for the communion. Grace was now again descending into Marie's heart, and she was convinced that if the Blessed Virgin had refused to cure her it was, indeed, her own fault, in having doubted when she entered the piscina. And she, therefore, repented of her rebellion as of a crime. Could she ever be forgiven? Her pale face sank down among her beautiful fair hair, her eyes filled with tears, and she looked at Pierre with an expression of anguish. "Ohl how wicked I was, my friend", she said. "It was through hearing you relate how that Prefect and those magistrates sinned through pride, that I believe, my friend; there is no happiness outside faith and love."

Then, as Pierre wished to break off at the point which he had reached, they all began protesting and calling for the continuation of his narrative, so that he had to promise to go on to the triumph of the Grotto.

Its entrance remained barred by the palisade, and you had to come secretly at night if you wished to pray and carry off a stolen bottle of water. Still, the fear of rioting increased, for it was rumoured that whole villages intended to come down from the hills in order to deliver God, as they naïvely expressed it. It was a levée en masse of the humble, a rush of those who hungered for the miraculous, so irresistible in its impetuosity that mere common sense, mere considerations of public order were to be swept away like chaff. And it was Monseigneur Laurence, in his episco-pal residence at Tarbes, who was first forced to surrender. All his prudence, all his doubts were outflanked by the popular outburst. For five long months he had been able to remain aloof, preventing his clergy from following the faithful to the Grotto, and defending the Church against the tornado of superstition which had been let loose. But what was the use of struggling any longer? He felt the wretchedness of the suffering people committed to his care to be so great that he resigned himself to granting them the idolatrous religion for which he realised them to be eager. Some prudence remaining to him, however, he contented himself in the first instance with drawing up an ordonnance, appointing a commission of inquiry, which was to investigate the question; this implied the acceptance of the miracles after a period of longer or shorter duration. If Monscigneur Laurence was the man of healthy culture and cool reason that he is pictured to have been, how great must have been his anguish on the morning when he signed that ordonnance! He must have knelt in his oratory, and have begged the Sovereign Master of the world to dictate his conduct to him. He did not believe in the apparitions; he had a loftier, more intellectual idea of the manifestations of the Divinity. Only, would he not be showing true pity and mercy in silencing the scruples of his reason, the noble prejudices of his faith, in presence of the necessity of granting that bread of falsehood which poor humanity requires in order to be happy? Doubless, he begged the pardon of Heaven for allowing it to be mixed up in what he regarded as childish pastime, for exposing it to ridicute in connection with an affair in which there was only sickliness and dementia. But his flock suffered so much, hungered so ravenously for the marvellous, for fairy stories with which to lull the pains of life. And thus, in tears, the Bishop at last sacrificed his pains of life. And thus, in tears, the Bishop at last sacrificed his respect for the dignity of Providence to his sensitive pastoral respect for the dignity of Providence to his sensitive pastoral purity, the universal human quantum and the dignity of Providence to his sensitive pastoral respect for the dignity of Providence to his sensitive pastoral purity.

Then the Emperor in his turn gave way. He was at Biarritz at
Then the woeld human flock.

Crotto. to remove the palisade, so as to allow everybody tree access to the drink life at the holy source. So he sent a telegram, a curt order unpopular decree which torbade despairing sufferers to go and to close the portals of illusion to the wretched by upholding the compassion for the disinlicrited. Like the Bishop, he did not wish influenced by a revival of his old humanitarian dreams, his genuine No doubt she did intervene, but the Emperor was more deeply spread that he had yielded to the entreaties of his wife Eugenie. decision of a naturally timid man, he spoke out. The rumour Then, all at once, with the sudden ever he held his tongue. who distrusted the disturbances of the imagination; and still and strongly interested; on the other the undeflevers and the statesmen the believers and the men of tanciful minds whom the Mysterious A trucciess warfare was being waged around him; on one side watched and drew him on one side, and still he held his tongue, Bishops came, great personages, great ladies of his circle wonted silence—the deep silence of a day-dreamer which nobody ever penetrated. Petitions arrived day by day, yet he held his common sense and public order, the Emperor preserved his ior were behing of Police Commissary and bas Prefect, men had not meddied in them. And whilst his Minister, not have been complete if the pens of Voltairean newspaperpress was also occupying itself, for the persecutions would with this affair of the apparitions, with which the entire Parisian the time, and was kept regularly informed of everything connected

Then came a shout of joy and triumph. The decree annulling the previous one was read at Lourdes to the sound of drum and trumpet. The Commissary of Police had to come in person to superintend the removal of the palisade. He was afterwards transferred elsewhere, like the Prefect. People flocked to Lourdes ferred elsewhere, like the Prefect.

11 think this view of the matter the right one, for, as all who know the history of the Second Empire are aware, it was about this time that the Emperor beginn to take great interest in erecting model dwellings for the working classes, and in planting and transforming the sandy wastes of the Landes.—Trans.

The Prefect was transferred to Grenoble, and curiously for the Prefect was transferred to Grenoble, and curiously for the Prefect was transferred to Grenoble, and curiously for the Prefect was transferred to Grenoble, and curiously for the Prefect was transferred to Grenoble, and curiously for the Prefect was transferred to Grenoble, and curiously for the Prefect was transferred to Grenoble, and curiously for the Prefect was transferred to Grenoble, and curiously for the Prefect was transferred to Grenoble, and curiously for the Prefect was transferred to Grenoble, and curiously for the Prefect was transferred to Grenoble, and curiously for the Prefect was transferred to Grenoble, and curiously for the Prefect was transferred to Grenoble, and Company for the Preferred to Grenoble t from all parts, the new cultus was organised at the Grotto, and a 'ery of joy ascended: God had won the victory! God? alas no! It was human wretchedness which had won the battle, human wretchedness with its eternal need of falsehood, its hunger for the marvellous, its everlasting hope akin to that of some condemned man who, for salvation's sake, surrenders himself into the hands of an invisible Omnipotenee, mightier than nature, and alone capable, should it be willing, of annulling nature's laws. And that which had also conquered was the sovereign compassion of those pastors, the merciful Bishop and merciful Emperor who allowed those big sick children to retain the fetich which consoled some of them and at times even cured others.

In the middle of November the episcopal commission came to Lourdes to prosecute the inquiry which had been entrusted to it. It questioned Bernadette yet once again, and studied a large number of miracles. However, in order that the evidence might be absolute, it only registered some thirty cases of cure. And Monseigneur Laurence declared himself convinced. Nevertheless, he gave a final proof of his prudence, by continuing to wait another three years before declaring in a pastoral letter that the Blessed Virgin had in truth appeared at the Grotto of Massabielle and that numerous miracles had subsequently taken place there. Meantime, he had purchased the Grotto itself with all the land around it, from the municipality of Lourdes, on behalf of his See. Work was then begun, modestly at first, but soon on a larger and larger scale as money began to flow in from all parts of Christendom. The Grotto was cleared and enclosed with an iron railing. The Gave was thrown back into a new bed, so as to allow of spacious approaches to the shrine, with lawns, paths, and walks. At last, too, the church which the Virgin had asked for, the Basilica, began to rise on the summit of the rock itself. From the very first stroke of the pick, Abbé Peyramale, the parish priest of Lourdes, went on directing everything with even excessive zeal, for the struggle had made him the most ardent and most sincere of all the believers in the work that was to be accomplished. With his somewhat tough but truly fatherly nature, he had begun to adore Bernadette, making her mission his own, and devoting himself, soul and body, to realising the orders which he had received from Heaven through her innocent mouth. And he exhausted himself in mighty efforts; he wished everything to be very beautiful and very grand, worthy of the Queen of the Angels who had deigned to visit this mountain nook. The first religious ceremony did not take place till six years after the apparitions. A marble statue of the Virgin was installed with great pomp on the very

his new jurisdiction extended over the hills and valleys of La Salette, whither pilgrims likewise flocked to drink, pray, and wash themselves at a miraculous fountain. Warned by experience, however, Baron Massy (such was the Prefect's name) was careful to avoid any further interference in religious matters.—Trans.

spot where she had appeared. It was a magnificent day, all Lourdes was gay with flags, and every bell rang joyously. Five years later, in 1869, the first mass was celebrated in the crypt of the Basilica, whose spire was not yet finished. Meantime gifts flowed in without a pause, a river of gold was streaming towards the Crotto, a whole town was about to spring up from the soil be healed did heal; the thirst for a miracle worked the miracle. A deity of pity and hope was evolved from man's sufferings, from that longing for falsehood and relief, which, in every age of that longing for falsehood and relief, which, in every age of that longing for falsehood and relief, which, in every age of where an almighty power renders justice and distributes eternal happiness.

And thus the siling ones of the Sainte-Honorine Ward only beheld in the victory of the Crotto the triumph of their hopes of cure. Along the rows of beds there was a quiver of joy when, with his heart stirred by all those poor faces turned towards him, eager for certainty, Pierre repeated: "God had conquered, Since that day the miracles have never ceased, and it is the most humble who are the most frequently relieved."

Then he laid down the little book. Abbé Judaine was coming in, and the Sacrament was about to be administered. Man'e however, again penetrated by the fever of faith, her hands burning, leant towards Pierre. "Oh, my thend!" said she, "I pray you hear me confess my fault and absolve me. I have blasphemed, and have been guilty of mortal sin. If you do not succour me, I shall be unable to receive the Blessed Sacrament, and yet I so greatly need to be consoled and strengthened."

greatly need to be consoled and strengthened."

The young priest refused her request with a wave of the hand. He had never been willing to act as confessor to this friend, the only woman he had loved in the healthy smiling days of youth. However, she insisted. "I beg you to do so," said she; "you work the miracle of my cure."

Then he gave way, and received the avowal of her fault, that impious rebellion induced by suffering, that rebellion against the Virgin who had remained deaf to her prayers. And afterwards her granted her absolution in the grantental form.

Meanwhile Abbé Judaine had already deposited the cibonum on a little table, between two lighted tapers, which looked like woeful stars in the semi-obscurity of the ward. Madame de Jonquière had just decided to open one of the windows quite wide, for the odour emanating from all the suffering bodies and from the narrow courtyard into which the vindow opened; though black with night, it seemed like a well of fire. Having offered to act as server, Pierre repeated the "Confitcor." Then, after responding with the "Misereatur" and the "Indulgentiam," the responding with the "Misereatur" and the "Indulgentiam," the responding with the "Misereatur" and the "Indulgentiam," the phapian, who wore his alb, raised the pyx, saying, "Beholt chaptain, who wore his alb, raised the pyx, saying, "Beholt chaptain, who wore his alb, raised the pyx, saying, "Beholt chaptain, who wore his alb, raised the pyx, saying, "Beholt chaptain, who wore his alb, raised the pyx, saying, "Beholt chaptain, who wore his alb, raised the pyx, saying, "Beholt chaptain, who wore his alb, raised the pyx, saying, "Beholt chaptain, who wore his alb, raised the pyx, saying, "Beholt chaptain, who wore his alb, raised the pyx, saying, "Beholt chaptain who wore his alb, raised the pyx, saying, "Beholt chaptain who wore his alb, raised the pyx, saying, "Beholt chaptain who wore his alb, raised the pyx, saying, "Beholt chaptain who wore his alb, raised the pyx and pyx alb who was a server."

Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world." All the women who, writhing in agony, were impatiently awaiting the communion, like dying creatures who await life from some fresh medicine which is a long time coming, thereupon thrice repeated, in all humility, and with lips almost closed: "Lord, I am not worthy that Thou shouldst enter under my roof; but only say the word and my soul shall be healed." Abbé Judaine had begun to make the round of those woeful beds, accompanied by Pierre, and followed by Madame de Jonquière and Sister Hyacinthe, each of whom carried one of the lighted tapers. The Sister designated those who were to communicate; and, murmuring the customary Latin words, the priest leant forward and placed the Host somewhat at random on the sufferer's tonguc. Almost all were waiting for him with widely opened, glittering eyes, amidst the disorder of that hastily pitched camp: Two were found to be sound asleep, however, and had to be awakened. Several were moaning without being conscious of it, and continued moaning even after they had received the sacrament. At the far end of the ward, the rattle of the poor creature who could not be seen still resounded. And nothing could have been more mournful than the appearance of that little cortège in the semi-darkness, amidst which the yellow flames of the tapers gleamed like stars.

But Marie's face, to which an expression of ecstasy had returned, was like a divine apparition. Although La Grivotte was hungering for the bread of life, they had refused her the sacrament on this occasion, as it was to be administered to her in the morning at the Rosary; Madame Vêtu, however, had received the Host on her black tongue in a hiccough. And now Marie was lying there under the pale light of the tapers, looking so beautiful amidst her fair hair, with her eyes dilated and her features transfigured by faith, that every one admired her. She received the sacrament with rapture; Heaven visibly descended into her poor, youthful frame, reduced to such physical wretchedness. And, clasping Pierre's hand, she detained him for a moment, saying: "Oh? she will heal me, my friend, she has just promised me that she will do so. Go and take some rest. I shall sleep so soundly

now!"

As he withdrew in company with Abbé Judaine, Pierre caught sight of little Madame Désagueaux stretched out in the arm-chair in which weariness had overpowered her. Nothing could awaken her. It was now half-past one in the morning; and Madame de Jonquière and her assistant, Sister Hyacinthe, were still going backwards and forwards, turning the patients over, cleansing them, and dressing their sores. However, the ward was becoming more peaceful, its heavy darkness had grown less oppressive since Bernadette with her charm had passed through it. The visionary's little shadow was now flitting in triumph from bed to bed, completing its work, bringing a little of heaven to each of the das pairing ones, each of the disinherited ones of this world; and as they all at last sank to sleep they could see the little shepherdess, so young, so ill herself, leaning over them and kissing them with a kindly smile.

THE THIRD DAY

BED VND BOYED

AT seven o'clock on the morning of that fine, bright, warm August Sunday, M. de Guersaint was already up and dressed in one of the two little rooms which he had fortunately been able to seeme on the third floor of the Hotel of the Apparitions. He had gone to bed at eleven o'clock the night before, and had awake feeling quite fresh and gay. As soon as he was dressed he entered the adjoining room which Pierre occupied; but the young priest, who had not returned to the hotel until past one in the morning, with his blood heated by insomnia, had been unable to doze off until daybreak, and was now still slumbering. His eassoek flung across a chair, his other garments scattered here and there, testified to his great weariness and agitation of mind. "Come, come, you lazybones!" cried M. de Guersaint gaily; "Come, come, you lazybones!" cried M. de Guersaint gaily; "can't you hear the bells ringing?"

can t you near the belis inguigt.

Pierre awoke with a start, quite surprised to find himself in that little hotel room into which the sunlight was streaming. All the joyous peals of the bells, the music of the chiming, happy town, moreover, came in through the window which he had left open.

"We shall never have time to get to the hospital before eight moreover, came in through the window which he had left open.

"We shall never have time to get to the hospital before eight o'clock to fetch Marie," resumed M. de Guersaint, "for we must brue come breakfest eh?"

pane some preakfast, chi"

be such a fearful noise. I was woke up three times during the night. People kept on talking in the room next to mine. And you, did you sleep well?"

"No, indeed," answered Pierre; "I was tired to death. but I couldn't close my eyes. No doubt it was the uproar you speak' of that prevented me."

In his turn, he then began to talk of the thin partitions, and the manner in which the house had been crammed with people until it seemed as though the floors and the walls would collapse with the strain. The place had been shaking all night long; every now and then people suddenly rushed along the passages, heavy footfalls resounded, gruff voices ascended nobody knew whence; without speaking of all the moaning and coughing, the frightful coughing which semed to re-echo from every wall. Throughout the night people evidently came in and went out, got up and lay down again, paying no attention to the hour in the disorder in which they lived, amid shocks of passion which made them hurry to their devotional exercises as to pleasure parties.

"And Marie, how was she when you left her last night?" M. de Guersaint suddenly inquired.

"A great deal better," replied Pierre; "she had an attack of extreme discouragement, but all her courage and faith returned to her at last."

A pause followed; and then the girl's father resumed with his tranquil optimism: "Ohl I am not anxious. Things will go on all right, you'll see. For my own part, I am delighted. I had asked the Virgin to grant me her protection in my affairs—you know, my great invention of navigable balloons. Well, suppose I told you that she has already shown me her favour? Yes, indeed; yesterday evening while I was talking with Abbé Des Hermoises, he told me that at Toulouse he would no doubt be able to find a person to finance me-one of his friends, in fact, who is extremely wealthy and takes great interest in mechanics! And in this I at once saw the hand of God!" M. de Guersaint began laughing with his childish laugh, and then he added: "That Abbé Des Hermoises is a charming man. I shall see this afternoon if there is any means of my accompanying him on an excursion to the Cirque dc Gavarnie at small cost."

Pierre, who wished to pay everything, the hotel bill and all the rest, at once encouraged him in this idea. "Of course," said he, "you ought not to miss this opportunity to visit the mountains, since you have so great a wish to do so. Your daughter will be very happy to know that you are pleased."

Their talk, however, was now interrupted by a scrvant girl bringing the two cups of chocolate with a couple of rolls on a metal tray covered with a napkin. She left the door open as she entered the room, so that a glimpse was obtained of some portion of the passage. 'Ahl they are already doing my neighbour's room!"

"Smid diw ei 9iw exclaimed M. de Guersaint. "He is a married man, isn't he? His quite alone!" The servant looked astonished. "Oh no," she replied, 'he is "Quite alone? Why, I heard people talking in his room this and he orders good wine and the best of everything, I can tell you. As he doesn't care to eat with everybody, he takes his meals there, him, for it isn't a large one, though there is a big cupboard in it. and had to content himself with that room, which greatly worned in the lane by the side of the hotel; but this year he applied too late very respectable gentleman. Last year he was able to have one of the little pavilions which Monsicur Majesté lets out to visitors, tray and placing them on the table, she continued: "Ohl he is a up at once." And then, while taking the cups of chocolate off the just gone out after giving orders that his room was to be tidied You must be mistaken, monsieur," said the servant; "he has ".gnimom Pierre had been listening somewhat inquisitively to all this chatter. "And on this side, my side," said he, "isn't there a gentleman with two ladies, and a little boy who walks about with too well last night, and I must have heard him talking in his sleep." That explains it all! replied M. de Quersaint gaily; "he dined with the other one. This is the second year they have come to Vigneron, with their son Gustave, have had to content themselves took one of the two rooms for herself; and Monsicur and Madame "Yes, Monsieur l'Abbe, I know thenr. The nunt Madame Chaise, Lourdes. They are yery respectable people, too."

a crutch?"

accommodation, had been obliged to sleep on a billiard-table, up on the landings; and one honourable ecelesiastic for lack of other rooms the previous evening and lie in a heap in the washhouse.

During the night, also, some camp bedsteads had even been set was crowded to its garrets. The servants had had to give up their all alone, a young lady, too, who was unaccompanied, and then a family party which included five young children. The hotel couple; whilst on the right lodged another gentleman who was then a mother with three daughters, and then an old married reached by the same passage; on the left hand, there was a priest, and she began to enumerate the other persons whose rooms were incommoded. However, the servant was now thoroughly started, cognise the voice of M. Vigneron, whom the heat doubtless had Pierre nodded. During the night he had fancied he could re-

Each of the third-floor rooms on this side of the hotel wer ped for a monical on to the narrow balcony outside his window. who remained alone, felt attracted by the gay sunlight, and stephis hands again, for he was very careful of his person; and Pierre, When the girl had retired and the two men had drunk their chocolate, M. de Guersaint went back into his own room to wash. ຼຸ່ມບບຄບຂອ

vided with a similar, balcony, having a carved-wood balustrade. However, the young priest's surprise was very great, for he had scarcely stepped outside when he suddenly saw a woman protrude her head over the balcony next to him-that of the room occupied by the gentleman whom M. de Guersaint and the servant had been speaking of. And this woman he had recognised: it was Madame Volmar. There was no mistaking her long face with its delicate, drawn features, its magnificent large eyes, those brasiers over which a veil, a dimming moire, seemed to pass at times. She gave a start of terror on perceiving him. And he, extremely ill at ease, grieved that he should have frightened her, made all haste to withdraw into his apartment. A sudden light had dawned upon him, and he now understood and could picture everything. So this was why she had not been seen at the Hospital, where little Madame Désagneaux was always asking for her. Standing motionless, his heart upset, Pierre fell into a deep reverie, reflecting on the life led by this woman whom he knew, that torturing conjugal life in Paris between a fierce mother-in-law and an unworthy husband, and then those three days of complete liberty spent at Lourdes, that brief bonfire of passion to which she had hastened under the sacrilegious pretext of serving the Divinity. Tears whose cause he could not even explain, tears that ascended from the very depths of his being, from his own voluntary chastity, welled into his eyes amidst the feeling of intense sorrow which came over him.

"Well, are you ready?" joyously called M. de Guersaint as he came back, with his grey jacket buttoned up and his hands gloved.
"Yes, yes, let us go," replied Pierre, turning aside and pretending to look for his hat so that he might wipe his eyes.

Then they went out, and on crossing the threshold heard on their left hand an unctuous voice which they recognised; it was that of M. Vigneron who was loudly repeating the morning prayers. A moment afterwards came a meeting which interested them. They were walking down the passage when they were passed by a middle-aged, thickset, sturdy-looking gentleman, wearing care-fully trimmed whiskers. He bent his back and passed so rapidly that they were unable to distinguish his features, but they noticed that he was carrying a carefully made parcel. And immediately afterwards he slipped a key into the lock of the room adjoining M. de Guersaint's, and opening the door disappeared noiselessly, like

M. de Guersaint had glanced round: "Ahl my neighbour," said he; "he has been to market and has brought back some delicacies,

Pierre pretended not to hear, for his companion was so lightminded that he did not care to trust him with a secret which was not his own. Besides, a feeling of uneasiness was returning to him, a kind of chaste terror at the thought that the world and the flesh were there taking their revenge, amidst all the naystical enthusiasm which he could feel around him.

nine o'elock, won't you, Pierre? It is agreed, you have given me your word." it would be useless. But you will come for me this evening at liberty for the remainder of the day. "No, don't come to fetch me," she said, "I shall not go back to the Grotto this afternooninstalled her in the Sainte-Honorine Ward, she gave them their taken back to the Hospital, complaining that the bright light tired her eyes. And when her father and the priest had again tront of the Crofto, that already at ten o'clock she asked to be ing peacefulness of the night. That morning, indeed, she felt so lost among the innumerable patients who were heaped together in trom the Virgin when they were alone together in the slumber-Doubtless she imagined that she would only obtain a hearing become, at last promised that he would make the application. her health, the young priest, seeing how unhappy she had suddenly the effect which a night spent in the open air might have upon coveted, but which only a few favoured ones with difficulty secured. After protesting, anxious as he felt with regard to This was a favour which all the sufferers ardently permission tor her to spend the following night before the then, assuming an air of mystery, she begged Pierre to obtain sion, she added that she did not expect to be cured that day; and Still with the same restful, smiling expressaid, it he did not go. She should really be displeased with him, she trip to Cavarnie. scolded him when she learnt that he had not yet decided on his had slept well and was very gay. She kissed her father and prought out to be earried to the Crotto; and they found that Marie They reached the Hospital just as the patients were being

He repeated that he would endeavour to secure the requisite permission, and that, if necessary, he would apply to Father Fourcade in person.

"Then, this evening, darling," said M. de Guersaint, kissing her his daughter, And he and Pierre went off together, leaving her lying on her bed, with an absorbed expression on her features as higher emiling with an absorbed expression on her features as higher emiling with an absorbed expression on her features as her large, smiling eyes wandered away into space. It was barely half-past ten when they got back to the Hotel of the Aparitions; but M. de Cuersaint, whom the fine weather delighted, talked of having déjeuner at once, so that he might the sooner start upon a ramble through Lourdes. First of all, however, he wished to go up to his room, and Pierre following him, ever, he wished to go up to his room, and Pierre following him, occupied by the Vignerons was wide open, and little Custave could be seen lying on the softa which served as his bed. He was livid, a moment previously he had suddenly fainted, and this had nade the father and mother intagine that the end had come, made the father and mother intagine that the end had come. Madame Vigneron was erouching on a chair, still stupested by her fright, whilst M. Vigneron rushed about the room, thrusting everything aside in order that he might prepare a glass of sugared-water, to which he added a few drops of some elixir. This draught, he exclaimed, would set the lad right again. But all the same, it was incomprehensible. The boy was still strong, and to think that he should have fainted like that, and have turned as white as a chicken! Speaking in this wise, M. Vigneron glanced at Madame Chaise, the aunt, who was standing in front of the sofa, looking in good health that morning; and his hands shook yet more violently at the covert idea that if that stupid attack had carried off his son, they would no longer have inherited the aunt's fortune. He was quite beside himself at this thought, and eagerly

172 · LOURDES

When Pierre and M. de Guersaint at last left their rooms, and went downstairs, they found to their annoyance that there was not the smallest table-corner vacant in the large dining-room. A most extraordinary mob had assembled there, and the few seats that were still unoccupied were reserved. A waiter informed them was the rush of appetite, sharpened by the keen mountain air. So was the rush of appetite, sharpened by the keen mountain air. So want them as soon as there should be a couple of vaeant places. Then, scarcely knowing what to do with themselves, they went to wailk about the hotel porch, whence there was a view of the street, along which the townsfolk, in their Sunday best, streamed without a pause.

All at once, however, the landlord of the Hotel of the Apparitions, Master Majesté in person, appeared before them, elad in white from lead to foot; and with a great show of politeness he inquired if the gentlemen would like to wait in the drawing-room. He was a stout man of five-and-forty, and strove to bear the burden of his name in a right royal fashion. Bald and elean-shaven, with round blue eyes in a waxy face, displaying three superposed chins, he always deported himself with much dignity. He had saylum, and was matried to a dusky little woman, a native of Lourdes. In less than fifteen vears they had made their hotel one of the most substantial and best-patronised establishments in the town. Of recent times, moreover, they had started a business in religious articles, installed in a large shop on the left of these hotel porel, and managed by a young nicee under Madame of the hotel porel, and managed by a young nicee under Madame

"You ean wait in the drawing-room, gentlemen," again suggested the hotel-keeper, whom Pierre's cassock rendered very attentive.

They replied, however, that they presented to walk about and wait in the open air. And thereupon Majeste would not leave them, but deigned to chart with them for a moment as he was wont to do with those of his customers whom he desired to honour. The conversation turned at first on the procession which vould take place that night, and which promised to be a superb spectacle, as the weather was so fine. There were more than fifty thousand strangers gathered together in Lourdes that day, for visitors had come in from all the neighbouring bathing stations. This explaince come in from all the neighbouring bathing stations. This explainstangers gathered together in Lourdes that day, for visitors had strangers gathered together in Lourdes that day, for visitors had strangers gathered as the previous year.

"You saw what a seramble there is," concluded Majeste, "we really don't know how to manage. It isn't my fault, I assure if you are kept waiting for a short time."

At this moment, however, a postman arrived wit' of newspapers and letters which he deposited or fright, whilst M. Vigneron rushed about the room, thrusting everything aside in order that he might prepare a glass of sugared-water, to which he added a few drops of some elixir. This draught, he exclaimed, would set the lad right again. But all the same, it was incomprchensible. The boy was still strong, and to think that he should have fainted like that, and have turned as white as a chicken! Speaking in this wise, M. Vigneron glanced at Madame Chaise, the aunt, who was standing in front of the sofa, looking in good health that morning; and his hands shook yet more violently at the covert idea that if that stupid attack had carried off son, they would no longer have inherited the aunt's fortune. He was quite beside himself at this thought, and eagerly opening the boy's mouth he compelled him to swallow the entire contents of the glass. Then, however, when he heard Gustave sigh, and saw him open his cyes again, his fatherly goodnature reappeared, and he shed tears, and called the lad his dear little fellow. But on Madame Chaise drawing near to offer some assistance, Gustave repulsed her with a sudden gesture of hatred, as though he understood how this woman's money unconsciously perverted his parents, who, after all, were worthy folks. Greatly offended, the old lady turned on her heel, and seated herself in a corner, whilst the father and mother, at last freed from their anxiety, returned thanks to the Blessed Virgin for having preserved their darling, who smiled at them with his intelligent and infinitely sorrowful smile, knowing and understanding everything as he did, and no longer having any taste for life, although he was not fifteen. "Can we be of any help to you?" asked Picrre in an obliging way.

"No, no, I thank you, gentlemen," replied M. Vigneron, coming for a moment into the passage. "But oh! we did have a fright!

Think of it, an only son, who is so dear to us, too."

All around them the approach of the dejeuner hour was now throwing the house into commotion. Every door was banging, and the passages and the staircase resounded with the constant pitter-patter of feet. Three big girls passed by, raising a current of air with the sweep of their skirts. Some little children were crying in a neighbouring room. Then there were old people who seemed quite scared, and distracted priests who, forgetting their calling, caught up their cassocks with both hands, so that they might run the faster to the dining-room. From the top to the bottom of the house one could feel the floors shaking under the excessive weight of all the people who were packed inside the hotel.

"Oh, I hope that it is all over now, and that the Blessed Virgin will cure him," repeated M. Vigneron, before allowing his neighbours to retire. "We are going downstairs, for I must confess that all this has made me feel faint. I need something to eat, I am terribly hungry."

When Pierre and M. de Cuersaint at last left their rooms, and went downstairs, they found to their annoyance that there was not the smallest table-corner vacant in the large dining-room. A most extraordinary mob had assembled there, and the few seats that were still unoccupied were reserved. A waiter informed them was the rush of appetite, sharpened by the keen mountain air. So was the rush of appetite, sharpened by the keen mountain air. So wain them as soon as there should be a couple of vacant places to wait them as soon as there should be a couple of vacant places. Then, scarcely knowing what to do with themselves, they went to walk about the hotel porch, whence there was a view of the street, along which the townsfolk, in their Sunday best, streamed without along which the townsfolk, in their Sunday best, streamed without

All at once, however, the landlord of the Hotel of the Apparitions, Master Majeste in person, appeared before them, clad in white from head to foot; and with a great show of politeness he inwhite from head to foot; and with a great show of politeness he inwhite from head to foot; and with a great show of politeness he burden of his name in a right royal fashion. Bald and clean-shaven, with round blue eyes in a waxy face, displaying three superposed clins, he always deported himself with much dignity. He had come from Mevers with the Sisters who managed the orphan asylum, and was matried to a dusky little woman, a native of Lourdes. In less than fifteen years they had made their hotel one of the most substantial and best-patronised establishments in the town. Of recent times, moreover, they had started a business in religious articles, installed in a large shop on the left of the hotel porch and managed by a young niece under Madame of the hotel porch and managed by a young niece under Madame of the hotel porch and managed by a young niece under Madame Majeste's supervision. "You can wait in the drawing-room, gentlemen," again suggested the hotel-keeper, whom Pierre's cassock rendered very attentive.

They replied, however, that they preferred to walk about and wait in the open air. And thereupon Majeste would not leave them, but deigned to elast with them for a moment as he was wont to do with those of his customers whom he desired to honour. The conversation turned at first on the procession which would take place that night, and which promised to be a superb spectacle, as the weather was so fine. There were more than fifty thousand strangers gathered together in Lourdes that day, for visitors had strangers gathered together in Lourdes that day, for visitors had come in from all the neighbouring bathing stations. This explained the crush at the table dhote. Possibly the town would run slout of bread as had been the case the previous year.

"You saw what a scramble there is," concluded Majesté, "we really don't know how to manage. It isn't my fault, I assure you, it you are kept waiting for a short time."

At this moment, however, a postman arrived with a large batch of newspapers and letters which he deposited on a table in the office. He had kept one letter in his hand and inquired of the landlord, "Have you a Madame Maze here?"

"Madame Maze, Madame Maze," repeated the hotelkeeper.

"No, no, certainly not."

Pierre had heard both question and answer, and drawing near he exclaimed, "I know of a Madame Maze who must be lodging with the Sisters of the Immaculate Conception, the Blue Sisters as people call them here, I think."

The postman thanked him for the information and went off, but a somewhat bitter smile had risen to Majesté's lips. "The Blue Sisters," he muttered "ahl the Blue Sisters." Then, darting a side glance at Pierre's eassock, he stopped short, as though he feared that he might say too much. Yet his heart was overflowing; he would have greatly liked to ease his feelings, and this young priest from Paris, who looked so liberal-minded, could not be one of the "band," as he called all those who discharged functions at the Grotto and coined money out of Our Lady of Lourdes. Accordingly, little by little, he ventured to speak out.

"I am a good Christian, I assure you, Monsicur l'Abbé," said he.
"In fact, we are all good Christians here. And I am a regular worshipper and take the sacrament every Easter. But, really, I must say that members of a religious community ought not to keep hotels. No, no, it isn't right!"

And thereupon he vented all the spite of a tradesman in presence of what he considered to be disloyal competition. Ought not those Blue Sisters, those Sisters of the Immaculate Conception, to have confined themselves to their real functions, the manufacture of wafers for sacramental purposes, and the repairing and washing of church linen? Instead of that, however, they had transformed their convent into a vast hostelry, where ladies who came to Lourdes unaccompanied found separate rooms, and were able to take their meals either in privacy or in a general dining-room. Everything was certainly very clean, very well organised and very inexpensive, thanks to the thousand advantages which the Sisters enjoyed; in fact, no hotel at Lourdes did so much business. "But all the same," continued Majesté, "I ask you if it is proper? To think of nuns selling victuals! Besides, I must tell you that the lady superior is really a clever woman, and as soon as she saw the stream of fortune rolling in, she wanted to keep it all-for her own community and resolutely parted from the Fathers of the Grotto who wanted to lay their hands on it. Yes, Monsieur l'Abbé, she even went to Rome and gained her cause there, so that now she pockets all the money that her bills bring in. nuns, yes nuns, mon Dieul letting furnished rooms and keeping a table d'hôte.

He raised his arms to heaven, he was stifling with envy and vexation.

"But as your house is crammed," Pierre gently objected, "as you

no longer have either a bed or a plate at anybody's disposal, where would you put any additional visitors who might arrive

The state of the s

of the bourgeoisie who spend a fortnight and three weeks here at Sisters taking all the cream of the eustom, for instance the ladies made their fortunes. But no matter, it is vexing to see those Blue rank as the Hotel of the Crotto, where two landlords have already secure isn't nearly so great. For myself, thank Heaven, I am always satisfied. My house is well known, it oecupies the same only lasts four or five days, and in ordinary times the eustom we reason to complain during the national pilgrimage. But that quite true that there is work for all of us, and that nobody has Majesté at once degan protesting. "Ahl Monsieur l'Abbél" said here?"

a stretch; and that, too, just in the quiet season, when there are

last year. She went to the Crotto, came back, went there again, took her meals, and went to bed, And never did we have a world of complaint from her; she was always smiling, as though to say that she found everything very nice. She paid her bill, too, without even looking at it. Ahl one regrets people of that kind."

Short, thin, very dark, and dressed in black, with a little white shout, thin, very dark, and dressed in black, with a little white shout, thin, very dark, had dressed in black, with a little white shout. some figures, thereupon intervened in a shrill voice: "We had a eustomer like that, gentlemen, who stayed here for two months noticed leaning over an account-book in which she was adding up Madanie Majeste, whom Pierre and M. de Cuersaint had not good prices for their aecommodation without any higgling." not many people here. You understand, don't you? There are the Crotto, and pray there all day long, for days together, and pay the Grotto, and pray there all day long, for days together, and pay of a good Christian saddened by the scandals of the time. "Cer-However, Majeste was again wagging his head, with the air the persons who stay here are kind enough not to deal elsewhere." assortment of all the articles that are most in request. As a rule We have a shop close by, where you will find an of Lourdes before you leave, gentlemen, I hope that you will not to solicit custoin: "If you would like to buy a few little souvenirs collar, Madame Majesté had risen to her feet; and she now began supplies all the petty dealers in the town. And according to the reports which circulate, they have a finger in all the trade in religious articles, and levy a percentage on the millions of be driven out of the temple afresh. It is said, too, that the Fathers run that big shop yonder, just across the street, which where tapers and articles of piety are sold. A bishop declared that it was shameful, and that the buyers and sellers ought to set up near the Grotto, that shop which is always crowded, and are too greedy. You must have seen the shop which they have tainly," said he, "I don't want to show any disrespeet to the reverend Fathers, but it must in all truth be admitted that they chaplets, statuettes, and medals which are sold every year at

Majesté had now lowered his voice, for his accusations were becoming precise, and he ended by trembling somewhat at his imprudence in talking so confidentially to strangers. However the expression of Pierre's gentle, attentive face reassured him and so he continued with the passion of a wounded rival, resolved to go on to the very end. "I am willing to admit, said he, "that there is some exaggeration in all this. But none the less it does religion no good for people to see the reverent Fathers keeping shops like us tradesmen. For my part, of course I don't go and ask for a share of the money which they make by their masses, or a percentage on the presents which they receive so why should they start selling what I sell? Our business wa a poor one last year owing to them. There are already too many of us; nowadays every one at Lourdes sells "religious articles,' to such an extent, in fact, that there will soon be no butcher or wine merchants left—nothing but bread to eat and watch of thems. Ah! Monsieur l'Abbé, it is no doubt nice to have the Blessed Virgin with us, but things are none the less very bac at times."

A person staying at the hotel at that moment disturbed him but he returned just as a young girl came in search of Madame Majesté. The damsel, who evidently belonged to Lourdes, wa very pretty, small but plump, with beautiful black hair, and a round face full of bright gaiety.

"That is our niece, Apolline," resumed Majesté. "She has beer keeping our shop for two years past. She is the daughter of one of my wife's brothers, who is in poor circumstances. She was keeping sheep at Ossun, in the neighbourhood of Barrès when we were struck by her intelligence and nice looks and decided to bring her here; and we don't repent having done so for she has a great deal of merit, and has become a very good saleswoman."

A point to which he omitted to refer, was that there were rumours current of somewhat flighty conduct on Mademoiselle Apolline's part. But she undoubtedly had her value: she attracted customers by the power, possibly, of her large black eyes, which smiled so readily. During his sojourn at Lourdes the previous year, Gérard de Peyrelongue had scarcely stirred from the shore she managed, and doubtless it was only the matrimonial idea now flitting through his head that prevented him from returning thither. It seemed as though the Abbé Des Hermoises had taken his place, for this gallant ecclesiastic brought a great many ladies to make purchases at the respository.

"Ahl you are speaking of Apolline," said Madame Majesté at that moment coming back from the shop. "Have you noticed one thing about her, gentlemen—her extraordinary likeness to Bernadette? There, on the wall yonder, is a photograph of Bernadette when she was eighteen years old."

Pierre and M. de Guersaint drew near to examine the portrait, whilst Majesté, exclaimed: Bernadette, yes certainly—she was rather like Appolline, but not nearly so nice; she looked so sad and poor."

He would doubtless have gone on chattering, but just then the would doubtless have gone on chattering, but just all the waiter appeared and announced that there was at last a little table vacant. M. de Guersaint had twice gone to glance inside the dining-room, for he was eager to have his dejeuner and spend the temainder of that fine Sunday out of doors. So he now hastened away, without paying any further attention to Majesté, who remarked, with an amiable smile, that the gentlemen had not had so yery long to wait after all fruit-stands, which formed the only decorations of the table. And one's astonishment increased at sight of the motle and there was no symmetry even in the arrangement of the glass fashion. On the cloth were numerous stains of winc and sauce, other, and the covers were strewn about in higgledy-piggledy hour already, two sets of eustomers had followed one upon the enfladed from end to end. People had been eating at it for an at the sight presented by the table d'hote, which his glance now room for two covers-he felt quite upset, almost sick, in fact, brought indoors for the occasion, and on which there was scarcely installed at the little table-a garden-table which had been mist, laden with a suffocating smell of victuals, assailed the face.

Pierre at first failed to distinguish anything, but when he was too, as if you were entering a dainy oven, for a warm, steamy. noise of voices and the elatter of forks and plates; and it seemed, before you were deafened by the extraordinary uproat, the forty persons and close together, hustled by the three waiters each tune that they went by. You had seareely reached the threshold little tables standing against the walls upon cither side another accommodation for more than thirty people, whilst at the forty persons were packed together at the tele d'hôte, which was scarcely eleven yards in length and did not supply proper And, in the middle of the apartment, some peen lowcred. like rays penetrating into the room although the blinds had of meagre candelabra on the mantelpiece. Guipure curtains, more-over, hung at the five large windows looking on to the street, which was flooded with sunshine, some of the ardent arrowtable. The only ornaments were a gilt, zine clock and a couple amidst the continual seramble of the big caters who sat down at long apartment, painted a light oak colour, an oily yellow, which was already peeling away in places and soiled with stains in others. You realised that rapid wear and tear went on here Pierre had to cross the dining-room from end to end. It was a To reach the table mentioned by the waiter the architect and not had so very long to wait after all.

which was collected there-huge priests, scraggy girls, mothers overflowing with superfluous fat, gentlemen with red faces, and families ranged in rows and displaying all the pitiable, increasing ugliness of successive generations. All these people were perspiring, greedily swallowing, seated slantwise, lacking room to move their arms, and unable even to use their hands deftly. And amidst this display of appetite, increased tenfold by fatigue. and of cager haste to fill one's stomach in order to return to the Grotto more quickly, there was a corpulent ecclesiastic who in nowise hurried, but ate of every dish with prudent slowness, crunching his food with a ceaseless, dignified movement of the iaws.

"Fichtrel" exclaimed M. de Guersaint, "it is by no means cool in here. All the same, I shall be glad of something to eat, for I've felt a sinking in the stomach ever since I have been at Lourdes. And you—are you hungry?"

"Yes, yes, I shall cat," replied Pierre, though, truth to tell, he felt quite upset.

The menu was a copious onc. There was salmon, an omelet, mutton cutlets with mashed potatoes, stewed kidneys, cauliflowcrs, cold meats, and apricot tarts-everything cooked too much, and swimming in sauce which, but for its grittiness, would have been flavourless. However, there was some fairly fine fruit on the glass stands, particularly some peaches. And, besides, the people did not seem at all difficult to please; they apparently had no palates, for there was no sign of nausea. Hemmed in between an old priest and a dirty, full-bearded man, a girl of delicate build, who looked very pretty with her soft eyes and silken skin, was eating some kidneys with an expression of absolute beatitude, although the so-called "sauce" in which they swam was simply greyish water.

"Hun!" resumed even M. de Gucrsaint, "this salmon is not so bad. Add a little salt to it, and you will find it all right."

Pierre made up his mind to eat, for after all he must take sustenance for strength's sake. At a little table close by, however, he had just eaught sight of Madame Vigneron and Madame Chaise, who sat face to face, apparently waiting. And, indeed, M. Vigneron and his son Gustav soon appeared, the latter still-pale, and leaning more heavily than usual on his crutch. "Sit down next to your aunt," said his father; "I will take the chair beside your mother." But just then he perceived his two neighbours, and stepping up to them, he added: "Oh! he is now all right again. I have been rubbing him with some eau-de-Cologne, and his and his heavily he chile to take his best at the pricing."

and by-and-by he will be able to take his bath at the piscina."

Thereupon M. Vigneron sat down, and began to devour. But what an awful fright he had had! He again began talking of it aloud, despite himself, so intense had been his terror at the thought that the lad might go off before his aunt. The latter related jan jis lad, quite astonished, began staring at his father with his large, elear eyes, "Yes," added M. Vigneron, "you behaved very badly, you pushed her back just now, when she wanted to help you to suddenly inquired, "liave you asked your aunt's forgiveness?" The eating, he had got to the cutlets, and was swallowing the mashed potatoes by the forkful, when he fancied he could detect that Madame Chaise was sulking with her nephew. "Gustave," he saiding her nephew. old woman, and forget his son, who was so young. Talking and only he felt indignant at the idea that the Virgin might cure this a good-natured man, he had never desired anybody's death; dilated eyes, full of involuntary anxiety. Most certainly he was precise particulars, to which her brother-in-law listened with that whilst she was kneeling at the Grotto the day before, she had experienced a sudden feeling of relief, in fact, she flattered herself that she was cured of her heart complaint, and began giving

.min 10 mained with his eyes lowered on his plate, this time obstinately refusing to make the sorry show of affection which was demanded whilst Gustave, who, without any show of appetite, was finishing the noix of his cutlet, which had been cut into small pieces, re-Madame Chaise said nothing, but waited with a dignified air,

"Come, Gustave," resumed his father, "be a good boy. You kind, your aunt is, and all that she intends to do for he saw them surround him with attentions he no longer knew really hated the affection of his parents, to such a point that when But no, he would not yield, At that moment, indeed, he ".uov or you will make me quite angry with you." really grieve me, Gustave," said she: "ask your aunt's forgiveness, ted that they wished to save. However, Madame Vigneron, so dignified in her demeanour, came to lier husband's help. "You whether it were himself or the inheritance which his life represen-thoughts. not a word was spoken. So keen was the sense of hearing with which suffering lad endowed him, that he even heard the others' he not himself die later on, so as to suit the family convenience? He was aware of all this; he understood everything, even when it not better that his parents should obtain that money? Would Thereupon he gave way. What was the use of resisting? Was well to you just now." "I beg your pardon, aunt," he said, "for not having behaved at once kissed him and told him that she was not at all angry. And the Vignerons' delight in living was displayed in all candour. life and can no longer be deceived by anything. Madame Chaise with the air of a tender-hearted man who has seen too much of Then two big tears rolled down from his eyes, whilst he smiled

"If the kidneys are not up to much," M. de Guersaint now said to Pierre, "here, at all events, are some cauliflowers with a good

The formidable mastication was still going on around them. Pierre had never seen such an amount of eating, amidst such perspiration, in an atmosphere as stifling as that of a washhouse ull of hot steam. The odour of the victuals seemed to thicken nto a kind of smoke. You had to shout to make yourself heard, or everybody was talking in loud tones and the scared waiters aised a fearful clatter in changing the plates and forks: not to nention the noise of all the jaw-crunching, a mill-like grinding which was distinctly audible. What most hurt the feelings of he young priest, however, was the extraordinary promiscuity of his table d'hôte, at which men and women, young girls and ecclesiastics, were packed together in chance order, and satisfied heir hunger like a pack of hounds snapping at offal in all haste. Baskets of bread went round and were promptly emptied. And here was a perfect massacre of cold meats, all the remnants of the victuals of the day before, leg of mutton, veal and ham, encompassed by a fallen mass of transparent jelly which quivered like soft glue. They had all eaten too much already, but these viands seemed to whet their appetites afresh, as though the idea had come to them that nothing whatever ought to be left. The fat priest in the middle of the table, who had shown himself such a capital knife-and-fork, was now lingering over the fruit, having just got to his third peach, a huge one, which he slowly peeled and swallowed in slices with an air of compunction.

All at once, however, the whole room was thrown into agitation. A waiter had come in and begun distributing the letters which

Madame Majesté had finished sorting.
"Hallo!" exclaimed M. Vigneron; "a letter for me! This is surprising—I did not give my address to anybody." Then at a sudden recollection he added, "Yes, I did, though; this must have come from Sauvageot, who is filling my place at the Ministry." He opened the letter, his hands began to tremble, and suddenly he raised a cry: "The chief clerk is dead!"

Deeply agitated, Madame Vigneron was also unable to bridle

her tongue: "Then you will have the appointment!"

.This was the secret dream in which they had so long and so fondly indulged: the chief clerk's death, in order that he, Vigneron, assistant chief clerk for ten years past, might at last rise to the supreme post, the bureaucratic marshalship. And so great was his delight that he cast aside all restraint "Ahl the Blessed Virgin is certainly protecting me, my dear. Only this morning I again prayed to her for a rise, and, you see, she grants my prayer!"

However, finding Madame Chaise's eyes fixed upon his own, and seeing Gustave smile, he realised that he ought not to exult in this fashion. Each member of the family no doubt thought of well satisfied. Ahl the poor chief, I'm sorry for him. I shall have takes an interest in every one of us and will send us all home good-natured air, he resumed: "I mean that the Blessed Virgin sonal favours as might be desired. And so, again putting on his his or her interests and prayed to the Blessed Virgin for such per-he did not even confess to himself, would soon be gratified. And and no longer doubted that his most secret desires, those which In spite of all his efforts he could not restrain his exultation, "wobiw sid to his widow."

so all honour was done to the apricot tarts, even Gustave being allowed to eat a portion of one.

"It is surprising," now remarked M. de Cuersaint, who had just sppetites. ordered a cup of coffee; "it is surprising that one doesn't see more sick people here. All these folk seem to me to have first-rate mained the stains of all the wine and sauce which had been spilt the inercasing disorder of the table, where at last there only re-The apricot tarts, the cheese, the fruits were all engulfed amidst and who were eating as they had not eaten for a long time past. those noisy appetites, ailing ones whom the journey had braced, and lifeless features was now carrying her food to her mouth with a spoon, and slobbering over her napkin. Perhaps there were yet a spoon, and slobbering over her napkin. her entry leaning on two relatives, and with expressionless eyes And still farther away there was a temale idiot who had made a girl so thin and pale that she must surely be a consumptive. whom certainly suffered from cancer. Farther on, too, there was After a close inspection, however, in addition to Gustave, who ate no more than a little chicken, he ended by finding a man with a goitre seated at the table d'hote between two women, one of

"We will go back to the Grotto at once, it was nearly noon, nbou the cloth.

eli?" said M. Vigneron. Indeed, "To the Grottol" were well-nigh the only again with all speed. and swallowing, in order that they might repeat prayers and hymns The full mouths were eagerly masticating words you now heard.

"Well, as we have the whole afternoon before us," declared M.

my daughter so particularly wishes me to make it." I want to see also if I can get a conveyance for my excursion, as de Cuersaint, "I suggest that we should visit the town a little.

the assault would continue for more than another hour, and again lest gap at the table d'hôte was instantly filled up. In this wise vacant than its possession was eagerly contested, whilst the smal-No sooner did one of the little tables become ing for places. there he found a torrent of customers, new arrivals who were wait-Pierre, who was stiffing, was glad indeed to leave the dining-on. In the porch he was able to breathe again, though even would the different courses of the menu appear in procession, to be engulfed amidst the crunching of jaws, the stifling heat, and the growing nausea.

П

THE "ORDINARY"

WHEN Pierre and M. de Guersaint got outside they began walking slowly amidst the evergrowing stream of the Sundayfied crowd. The sky was a bright blue, the sun warmed the whole town, and there was a festive gaiety in the atmosphere, the keen delight that attends those great fairs which bring entire communities into the open air. When they had descended the crowded footway of the Avenue de la Grotte, and had reached the corner of the Plateau de la Merlasse, they found their way barred by a throng which was slowly flowing backward amidst a block of vehicles and the stamping of horses. "There is no hurry, however," remarked M. de Guersaint. "My idea is to go as far as the Place du Marcadal in the old town; for the servant girl at the hotel told me of a hair-dresser there whose brother lets out conveyances cheaply. Do you mind going so far?"
"I?" replied Pierre. "Go wherever you like, I'll follow you."

"All right—and I'll profit by the opportunity to have a shave." They were nearing the Place du Rosaire, and found themselves in front of the lawns stretching to the Gave, when an encounter again stopped them. Mesdames Désagneaux and Raymonde de Jonquière were here, chatting gaily with young Gérard de Peyrelongue. Both women wore light-coloured gowns, sea-side dresses as, it were, and their white silk parasols shone in the bright sunlight. They imparted, so to say, a pretty note to the scene-a touch of society chatter blended with the fresh laughter of youth.

"No, no," Madame Désagneaux was saying, "we certainly can't go and visit your 'ordinary' like that—at the very moment when all your comrades are eating."

Gerard, however, with a very gallant air, insisted on their ac-companying him, turning more particularly towards Raymonde, whose somewhat massive face was that day brightened by the radiant charm of health.

"But it is a very curious sight, I assure you," said the young man, "and you would be very respectfully received. Trust yourself to me, mademoiselle. Besides, we should certainly find M. Berthaud there, and he would be delighted to do you the honours.'

The second secon

secure three good meals for a daily payment of three francs apiece. together at small cost. Many of them were not rich, for they were recruited among all classes; however, they had contrived to established among themselves with the view of taking their meals the hospitallers of the Grotto, the piscinas and the hospitals-had members of the Hospitality of Our Lady of Salvation-the bearers, drew near in order to present their respects to the ladies, they were made acquainted with the question under discussion. The caidinary" was a kind of restaurant or table d'hôte which the Raymonde smiled, her clear eyes plainly saying that she was quite agreeable. And just then, as Pierre and M. de Guersaint

"It must be very interesting," said M. de Cuersaint when these hat everything might be comfortable and orderly. vaiters, and did not disdain to lend a hand themselves, in order they purchased their own supplies, recruited a cook and a few them smoong the poor. Everything was in their own management: And in fact they often had provisions to spare and distributed explanations had been given him. Let us go and see it, it we

Little Madame Désagneaux thereupon gave her consent. "Well are not in the way."

was afraid that it might not be quite proper." if we are going in a party," said she, "I am quite willing. But when this gentleman first proposed to take me and Raymonde, I so charming with her fair frizzy hair and creamy complexion. sympathy for this gay little woman, who was so full of life and side her on the other hand, experiencing a sudden feeling of She had accepted M. de Cuersaint's arm, and Pierre walked be-Then, as she began to laugh, the others followed her example.

purchases which he and his comrades made for their "ordinary," trifling matters, for having questioned him with regard to the manner in which money may be economised even in the most tonished him by her knowledge of housewifely duties and of the health and youth which she diffused, and at the same time as-She intoxicated him with the perfume of dacstion her own. solved that she would this time secure him, make him beyond all here was the husband whom she had so often dreamt of, she rethe best of principles despite her air of heedless youth. And since Bchind them came Raymonde, leaning upon Cérard's arm and

Meantime, M. de Guersaint and Madame Desagneaux were also expenditure still further, she proceeded to show him that they might have reduced their arenitect, chatting together. You must be fearfully tired madame," said the anger, she replied: "Oh no, indeed! Last night, it is true, faigue quite overcame me at the hospital; I sat down and dozed of, and Madame de Jonquière and the other ladies were good But with a gesture of revolt, and an exclamation of genuine enough to let me sleep on." At this the others again began to laugh; but still with the same angry air she continued: "And so I slept like a log until this morning. It was disgraceful, especially as I had sworn that I would remain up all night." Then, merriment gaining upon her in her turn, she suddenly burst into a sonorous laugh, displaying her beautiful white teeth. "Ahl a pretty nurse I am, and no mistake! It was poor Madame de Jonquière who had to remain on her legs all the time. I tried to coax her to come out with us just now. But she preferred to take a little rest."

Raymonde, who overheard these words, thereupon raised her voice to say: "Yes, indeed, my poor mamma could no longer keep on her feet. It was I who compelled her to lie down, telling her that she could go to sleep without any uneasiness, for we should get on all right without her-"

So saying, the girl gave Gérard a laughing glance. He even fancied that he could detect a faint squeeze of the fresh round arm which was resting on his own, as though, indeed, she had wished to express her happiness at being alone with him so that they might settle their own affairs without any interference. This quite delighted him; and he began to explain that if he had not had dejeuner with his comrades that day, it was because some friends had invited him to join them at the railway-station refreshment-room at ten o'clock, and had not given him his liberty until ment-room at ten o clock, and man and after the departure of the eleven-thirty train.

"" to anddonly resumed. "Do you hear them, màdemoiselle?"

The little party was now nearing its destination, and the uproarious laughter and chatter of youth rang out from a clump of trees which concealed the old zinc and plaster building in which the "ordinary" was installed. Gérard began by taking the visitors into the kitchen, a very spacious apartment, well fitted up, and containing a huge range and an immense table, to say nothing of numerous gigantic cauldrons. Here, moreover, the young man called the attention of his companions to the circumstance that the cook, a fat, jovial looking man, had the red cross pinned on his white jacket, being himself a member of the pilgrimage. Then, pushing open a door, Gérard invited his friends to enter the

It was a long apartment containing two rows of plain deal tables; and the only other articles of furniture were the numerous rushseated tavern chairs, with an additional table which served as a sideboard. The whitewashed walls and the flooring of shiny red tiles looked, however, extremely clean amidst this intentional bareness, which was similar to that of a monkish refectory. But the feature of the place which more particularly struck you, as you crossed the threshold, was the childish gaiety which reigned there; for, packed together at the tables, were a hundred and fifty hospitallers of all ages, eating with splendid appetites, laughing, applauding, and singing with their mouths fall. A wondrous fratemity united these men, who had flocked to Lourdes from every province of France, and who belonged to all elasses and represented every degree of fortune. Many of them knew nothing of one another, save that they met here and elbowed one another during three days every year, living together like ance of each other during the rest of the twelvennonth. Nothing pulgrimage, and then going off and remaining in absolute ignorance of each other during the rest of the twelvennonth. Nothing pulgrimage, united in the same charitable work, and to spend a pulgrimage, united in the same charitable work, and to spend a few days of hard labour and boyish delight in common once more; for it all became, as it were, an "outing" of a number of big few days of hard labour and boyish delight in common once more; to enjoy themselves and laugh together. And even the frugality of the general good humour, and the general good humour.

"You see" expressed humour.
"You see" expressed humour.
"You see" expressed humour.
"You see" expressed humour.

"You see," explained Gerard, "we are not at all inclined to be sad, although we have so much hard work to get through. The Hospitality numbers more than three hundred members and there are only about one hundred and fifty here at a time, for we have had to organise two successive services, so that there may always be some of us on duty at the Grotto and the hospitals.

The sight of the little party of visitors assembled on the threshold of the room seems to have increased the general delight; and Berthaud, the Superintendent of the Bearers, who was lunching at the head of one of the tables, gallantly rose up to receive the ladies.

"But it sniells very nice," exclaimed Madame Désagneaux in her giddy way. "Won't you invite us to come and taste your cookery to-morrow?"

"Old we can't ask ladies," replied Berthaud, laughing. "But if you gentlenten would like to join us to-morrow we should be extremely pleased to entertain you."

Extremely pleased to entertain you."

He had at once noticed the good understanding which prevailed between Gerard and Raymonde, and seemed delighted at it, for he greatly wished his cousin to make this match. He laughed placeantly at the enthusiastic gaiety, which the young girl displayed as she began to question him. "Is not that the Marquis de Salmon-Roquebert," she asked, "who is sitting over yonder between these two young men who look like shop assistants?"

"They say, in fact, the sons of a small stationer at Tarbee."
"They say, in fact, the sons of a small stationer at Tarbee."

"They are, in fact, the sons of a small stationer at Tarbes," replied Berthaud; "and that is really the Marquis, your neighbour of the Rue de Lille, the owner of that magnificent mansion, one of the richest and most noble men of title in France. You see how he is enjoying our mutton stew!"

It was true, the millionaire Marquis seemed delighted to be able to hoard himself for his three francs a day, and to sit down at table in genuine democratic fashion by the side of petty bourgeois and workmen who would not have dared to accost him in the street. Was not that chance a table symbolical of social communion, effected by the joint practice of charity? For his part, the Marquis was the more hungry that day, as he had bathed over sixty patients, sufferers from all the most abominable diseases of unhappy humanity, at the piscinas that morning. And the scene around him seemed like a realisation of the evangelical commonalty; but doubtless it was so charming and so gay simply because its duration was limited to three days.

Although M. de Guersaint had but lately risen from table, his curiosity prompted him to taste the mutton stew, and he pronounced it perfect. Meantime Pierre caught sight of Baron Suire, the director of the Hospitality, walking about between the rows of tables with an air of some importance, as though he had allotted himself the task of keeping an eye on everything, even on the manner in which his staff fed itself. The young pricst thereupon remembered the ardent desire which Marie had expressed to spend the night in front of the Grotto, and it occurred to him that the Baron might he willing to give the necessary authorisation.

"Certainly," replied the director, who had become quite grave whilst listening to Pierre, "we do sometimes allow it; but it is always a very delicate matter! You assure me at all events that this young person is not consumptive? Well, well, since you say that she so much desires it I will mention the matter to Father Fourcade and warn Madame de Jonquière, so that she may

let you take the young lady away.

He was in reality a very good-natured fellow, albeit so fond of assuming the air of an indispensable man weighed down by the heaviest responsibilities. In his turn he now detained the visitors, and gave them full particulars concerning the organisation of the Hospitality. Its members said prayers together every morning. Two board meetings were held each day, and were attended by all the heads of departments, as well as by the reverend Fathers and some of the chaplains. All the hospitallers took the Sacrament as frequently as possible. And, moreover, there were many complicated tasks to be attended to a prodigious rotation of duties, quite a little world to be governed The Baron spoke like a general who each year with a firm hand. gains a great victory over the spirit of the age; and, sending Berthaud back to finish his déjeuner, he insisted on escorting the ladies into the little sanded courtyard, which was shaded by some fine trees.

"It is very interesting, very interesting," repeated Madame esagneaux. "We are greatly obliged to you for your kindness, monseiur."

"Don't mention it, don't mention it, madame," answered the

So far Gérard had not quitted Raymonde's side, but M. de to show you my little army. Baron. "It is I who am pleased at having had an opportunity was to execute this commission. The young man began to laugh. "Will you again secept me as a guide: said he. "And by the way, if these gentlemen like to come as well, I will show up, the way, if these gentlemen like to come as well, I will show you the way, if these gentlemen like to come as well, I will show you the way. membered that a friend had requested her to send her a bottle of Lourdes water, And she thereupon asked Cérard how she Place du Marcadal, when Madame Désagneaux suddenly reof leave-taking in order that they might repair by themselves to the Cuersaint and Pierre were already exchanging glances suggestive was now overflowing with an idle, sauntening mob resembling crowd in the burning sunlight was increasing; the Place du Rosaire the priest, whilst Raymonde and Cérard brought up the rear. The set out again, Madame Désagneaux still between the architect and M. de Cuersaint immediately consented; and all five of them you the place where the bottles are filled, corked, packed in cases, and then sent off. It is a curious signit."

arches on the lefthand side of the Place. They formed a suite of three apartments of very simple aspect, in the first one the bottles were filled in the most ordinary of fashions. A little green-The bottling and packing shops were situated under one of the some concourse of sightseers on a day of public rejoicing.

Cérard went on giving explanations with a quiet, saussied air. Wice and for preserved fruits at Grasse. two, were put together with great care, and the bottles were de-posited inside them, on beds of the packing halls for flowers at reminded one in some degree of the packing halls for flowers at shavings. The boxes, most frequently made for one bottle or for regular packing shops, with carpenters' benches, tools, and heaps of to ensure preservation. Then came two other rooms which formed the little leaden capsules placed over the corks alone bore an inscription, and they were coated with a kind of ceruse, doubtless puddle of it upon the ground. There were no labels on the bottles; prevent the water from overflowing. In fact there was quite a trusted with the duty exercising no particular watchiulness to painted zinc barrel, not unlike a watering-cask, was dragged by a man from the Crotto, and the light-coloured bottles were then simply filled at its tap, one by one; the blouse-clad workman en-anybody you naturally have to pay for the packing and the earis only the price of the bottle itself. It you wish to have it sent to instance, a bottle of water here costs twenty centimes (2d.), which the Fathers don't sell the water as they are accused of doing. For goes on in the broad daylight. I would also point out to you that "The water," he said, "really comes from the Grotto as you can yourselves see, so that all the foolish jokes which one hears really have no basis. And everything is perfectly simple, natural, and goes on in the broad dealight. I would also point out to wan that

nage, and then it costs you one franc and seventy centimes

(1s. 4d.). However, you are perfectly at liberty to go to the source and fill the flasks and cans and other receptacles that you may choose to bring with you."

Pierre reflected that the profits of the reverend Fathers in this respect could not be very large ones, for their gains were limited to what they made by manufacturing the boxes and supplying the bottles, which latter, purchased by the thousand, certainly did not cost them so much as twenty centimes apiece. However, Raymonde and Madame Désagneaux, as well as M. de Guersaint, who had such a lively imagination, experienced deep disappointment at sight of the little green barrel, the capsules, sticky with ceruse, and the piles of shavings lying around the benehes. They had doubtless imagined all sorts of ceremonies; the observance of certain rites in bottling the miraculous water, priests in vestments pronouncing blessings, and choir-boys singing hymns of praise in pure crystalline voices. For his part, Pierre, in presence of all this vulgar bottling and packing, ended by thinking of the active power of faith. When one of those bottles reaches some faraway sickroom, and is unpacked there, and the sufferer falls upon his knees, and so excites himself by contemplating and drinking the pure water that he actually brings about the cure of his ailment, there must truly be a most extraordinary plunge into all-

"Ah!" exclaimed Gérard, as they came out, "would you like to see the storehouse where the tapers are kept before going to the offices? It is only a couple of steps away.

And then, not even waiting for their answer, he led them to the opposite side of the Place du Rosaire. His one desire was to amuse Raymonde, but, in point of fact, the aspect of the place where the tapers were stored was even less entertaining than that of the packing-rooms which they had just left. This storehouse, a kind of deep vault under one of the right-hand arches of the Place, was divided by timber into a number of spacious compartments, in which lay an extraordinary collection of tapers classified according to size. The overplus of all the tapers offered to the Grotto was deposited here; and such was the number of these superfluous candles that the little conveyances stationed near the Crotto-railing, ready to receive the pilgrims' offerings, had to be brought to the storehouse several times a day in order to be emptied there after which they were returned to the Grotto, and were promptly filled again. In theory, each taper that was offered ought to have been burnt at the feet of the Virgin's statuc; but so great was the number of these offerings, that although a couple of hundred tapers of all sizes were kept burning by day and night, at was impossible to exhaust the supply, which went on increasing and increasing. There was a rumour that the Fathers could not even find room to store all this wax, but had to sell it over and over again; and, indeed, certain friends of the

Crotto confessed, with a touch of pride, that the profit on the tapers alone would have sufficed to defray all the expenses of the

pasiness.

pic

the money represented by all that wax, which would ily away in which might have been conferred on the poor and the ailing with not, on the other hand, retrain from reflecting on the many benefits provide humanity with as much sustenance as bread, he could extravagance yield an illusive enjoyment and satisfaction which utilitarian, and could well understand that some apparent acts of gazed upon this mass of way, destined to be burnt in open day-light to the glory of God; and although he was by no means a rigid culation he attempted. As for Pierre, it was in silence that he getting at the exact figures, quite lost himself in the puzzling calwere piled up in fabulous numbers. M. de Cuersaint, desirous of The smaller ones, costing from fifty centimes to a franc apiece, and Madame Desagneaux. How many, how many there werel The quantity of these votive candles quite stupefied Raymonde

"But come, what about that bottle which I am to send off?"

abruptly asked Madame Desagneaux.

everything will be settled." "We will go to the office," replied Cérard. "In five minutes when the foundations of the adjacent Basilica had scarcely been this wretched shanty, which seemed to date from the innocent days How many millions of people must have already passed through a board outside was the inscription: "Apply here with reference to Masses, Offerings, and Brotherhoods, Forwarding office for Lourdes water, Subscriptions to the Annals of O.L. of Lourdes." which the wind and the rain had reduced to a state of ruin. The building was a paltry one, a hut of lath and plaster the stone stairway leading to the Basilica. The office was up above, on the left hand, at the corner of the path leading to the They had to cross the Place due Rosaire once more and ascend had to stop in order to give her friend's name and address; and when she had paid one franc and seventy centinnes, a small But they simply found a wicket at which Madame Desagneaux The whole party went in, eager to see what might be inside.

As soon as they were outside again Cerard pointed to a large inggage at a railway station. printed receipt was handed her, such as you receive on registering do not see them, but then they give up the custody of every This observation so astonished the young man that he rement a moment without replying. "It's true," he at last sai tor a moment without replying, But we see nothing of them," remarked Pierre.

There, that is where the Fathers reside. building standing two or three hundred yards away, and resumed:

(1s. 4d.). However, you are perfectly at liberty to go to the source and fill the flasks and cans and other receptacles that you may choose to bring with you."

Pierre reflected that the profits of the reverend Fathers in this respect could not be very large ones, for their gains were limited to what they made by manufacturing the boxes and supplying the bottles, which latter, purchased by the thousand, certainly did not cost them so much as twenty centimes apiece. However, Raymonde and Madame Désagneaux, as well as M. de Guersaint, who had such a lively imagination, experienced deep disappointment at sight of the little green barrel, the capsules, sticky with ceruse, and the piles of shavings lying around the benches. They had doubtless imagined all sorts of ceremonies; the observance of certain rites in bottling the miraculous water, priests in vestments pronouncing blessings, and choir-boys singing hymns of praise in pure crystalline voices. For his part, Pierre, in presence of all this vulgar bottling and packing, ended by thinking of the active power of faith. When one of those bottles reaches some faraway sickroom, and is unpacked there, and the sufferer falls upon his knees, and so excites himself by contemplating and drinking the pure water that he actually brings about the cure of his ailment, there must truly be a most extraordinary plunge into allpowerful illusion.

"Ahl" exclaimed Gérard, as they came out, "would you like to see the storehouse where the tapers are kept before going to the offices? It is only a couple of steps away.

And then, not even waiting for their answer, he led them to the opposite side of the Place du Rosaire. His one desire was to amuse Raymonde, but, in point of fact, the aspect of the place where the tapers were stored was even less entertaining than that of the packing-rooms which they had just left. This storehouse, a kind of deep vault under one of the right-hand arches of the Place, was divided by timber into a number of spacious compartments, in which lay an extraordinary collection of tapers, classified according to size. The overplus of all the tapers offered to the Grotto was deposited here; and such was the number of these superfluous candles that the little conveyances stationed near the Grotto-railing, ready to receive the pilgrims' offerings, had to be brought to the storehouse several times a day in order to be emptied there after which they were returned to the Grotto, and were promptly filled again. In theory, each taper that was offered ought to have been burnt at the feet of the Virgin's statue; but so great was the number of these offerings, that although a couple of hundred tapers of all sizes were kept burning by day and night, at was impossible to exhaust the supply, which went on increasing and increasing. There was a rumour that the Fathers could not even find room to store all this wax, but had to sell it over and over again; and, indeed, certain friends of the

botto confessed, with a touch of pride, that the profit on the agers alone would have sufficed to defray all the expenses of the usiness.

The quantity of these votive candles quite stupefied Raymonde and Madame Désagneaux. How many, how many there werely establier ones, eosting from fifty centimes to a franc apiece, vere piled up in fabulous numbers. M. de Guersaint, desirous of jetting at the exact figures, quite lost himself in the puzzling calciting at the exact figures, quite lost himself in the puzzling calculation he attempted. As for Pierre, it was in silence that he gazed upon this mass of wax, destined to be burnt in open day-nilitarian, and eould well understand that some apparent acts of ight to the glory of God; and although he was by no means a rigid ratification, and eould well understand that sand satisfaction which relitation and eould well understand that sand satisfaction which not, on the other hand, refrain from reflecting on the many benefits which might have been conferred on the poor and the ailing with the money represented by all that wax, which would fly away in smoke.

"But come, what about that bottle which I am to send off?"

abruptly asked Madame Desagneaux. "We will go to the office," replied Cérard. "In five minutes

They had to cross the Place due Rosaire once more and ascend the stone stairway leading to the Basilica. The office was up above, on the left hand, at the corner of the path leading to the above, on the left hand, at the corner of the path leading to the calvary. The building was a paltry one, a but of lath and plaster which the wind and the rain had reduced to a state of ruin. On a board outside was the inscription: "Apply here with reference to horse, Offerings, and Brotherhoods. Forwarding office for Loundes water. Subscriptions to the 'Annals of O.L., of Loundes." How many millions of people must have already passed through this wretehed shanty, which seemed to date from the innocent days when the foundations of the adjacent Basilies had seareely been laid!

The whole party went in, eager to see what might be inside. But they simply found a wieket at which Madame Désagneaux had to stop in order to give her friend's name and address; and when she had paid one franc and seventy centimes, a small printed receipt was handed her, such as you receive on registering luggage at a railway station.

As soon as they were outside again Gérard pointed to a large building standing two or three hundred yards away, and resumed: "There, that is where the Fathers reside."

"But we see nothing of them," remarked Pierre.
This observation so astonished the young man that he remained for a moment without replying. "It's true," he at last said, "we do not see them, but then they give up the custody of everything—

the Grotto and all the rest-to the Fathers of the Assumption during the national pilgrimage."

Pierre looked at the building which had been pointed out to him, and noticed that it was a massive stone pile resembling a fortress. The windows were closed, and the whole edifice looked lifeless. Yet everything at Lourdes came from it, and to it also everything returned. It seemed, in fact, to the young priest that he could hear the silent, formidable rake-stroke which extended over the entire valley, which caught hold of all who had come to the spot, and placed both the gold and the blood of the throng in the clutches of those reverend Fathers! However, Gérard just then resumed in a low voice: "But come, they do show themselves, for here is the reverend superior, Father Capdebarthe himself."

An ecclesiastic was indeed just passing, a man with the appearance of a peasant, a knotty frame, and a large head which looked as though carved with a billhook. His opaque eyes were quite expressionless, and his face, with its worn features, had retained a loamy tint, a gloomy, russet reflection of the earth. Monseigneur Laurence had really made a politic selection in confiding the organisation and management of the Grotto to those Garaison missionaries, who were so tenacious and covetous, for the most part sons of mountain peasants and passionately attached to the soil.

However, the little party now slowly retraced its steps by ways of the Plateau de la Merlasse, the broad boulevard which skirts the inclined way on the left hand and leads to the Avenue de la Grotte. It was already past one o'clock, but people were still eating their déjeuners from one to the other end of the overflowing town. Many of the fifty thousand pilgrims and sightseers collected within it had not yet been able to sit down and eat; and Pierre, who had left the table d'hôte still crowded, who had just seen the hospitallers squeezing together so gaily at the "ordinary," found more and more tables at each step he took. On all sides people were eating, eating without a pause. Hereabouts, however, in the open air, on either side of the broad road, the hungry ones were humble folk who had rushed upon the tables set up on either footway—tables formed of a couple of long boards, flanked by two forms, and shaded from the sun by narrow linen awnings. Broth and coffee were sold at these places at a penny the cup. The little loaves heaped up in high baskets also cost a penny a-piece. Hanging from the poles which upheld the awnings were sausages, chitterlings, and hams. Some of the open-air restaurateurs were frying potatoes, and others were concocting more or less savoury messes of inferior meat and onions. A pungent smoke, a violent odour, arose into the sunlight, mingling with the dust which was raised by the continuous tramp of the promenaders. Rows of people, moreover, were waiting at each cantine, so that each time a party rose from table fresh customers took possession of the benches ranged beside the oilcloth-covered planks, which were so narrow that there was searcely room for two bowls of soup to be placed side by side. And one and all made haste, and devoured with the ravenous hunger born of their fatigue, that insatiable appetite which so often follows upon great moral shoeks. In fact, when the mind had exhausted itself in prayer, when the mind hed exhausted itself in prayer, when everything physical had been forgotten amidst the mental flight into the legendary heavens, the human animal suddenly appeared, again asserted itself, and began to gorge. Moreover, under that dazzling Shuday sky, the seene was like that of a fairfield with all the gluttony of a merry-making community, a display of the delight which they felt in living, despite the multiplicity of their abominable ailments and the dearth of the miracles they hoped for.

They eat, they amuse themselves, what else can one expect?" "They eat, they amuse themselves, what else can one expect?" "They eat, they amuse themselves, what else can one expect?"

remarked Gerard, guessing the thoughts of his amiable companions.

"Ahl poor people!" murmured Pierre, "they have a perfeet right supplied by the urehins who rushed about through the crowd, note of this commercial eagerness, this scramble of hawkers, was them some souvenir of this holy Kermesse. And the bright gay same extent as they ate, in order that they might take away with On all sides people were buying almost to the religious prints. each street into a bazaar, but it overran the footways and barred the road with handcarts full of chaplets, medals, statuettes, and in every one of the shops, standing close together and transforming ing, impudent trafficking, pursued the pilgrims to the very out-skirts of the Grotto. Trade was not merely triumphantly installed it the lady escaped she heard muttered insults behind her. Traffick-with the bouquets—large round bouquets they were, carelessly fastened together and looking like cabbages, "A bouquet, madency, and looking like cabbages, "A bouquet, youngest of these harpies, almost lost the skirts of his froek-coat in attempting to escape their clutches. Then the scene began afresh gentleman, who was surrounded and shaken by three of the called, "buy a taper, buy a taper, it will bring you luckl" it into the hand of the promenader. "Monsieur," "madame," they played extraordinary effrontery. Even the old ones were searcely more disercet. With parcels of tapers under their arms, they prandished the one which they offered for sale and even thrust and bouquets, who with the rough fiereeness of conquerors assailed the passers-by in bands. They were mostly young women, with bare heads, or with kerehiefs tied over their hair, and they disthis fashion. However, when they had got to the lower part of the boulevard near the Grotto, his feelings were hurt at sight of the desperate eagerness displayed by the female vendors of tapers tle was greatly touched to see human nature reassert itself in to do so." crying the Journal de la Grotte. Their sharp, shrill voices pierced The Journal de la Grotte, this morning's number, two sous, the Journal de la Grotte."

Amidst the continual pushing which accompanied the eddying of the ever-moving crowd, Gérard's little party became separated. He and Raymonde remained behind the others. They had begun talking together in low tones, with an air of smiling intimacy, lost and isolated as they were in the dense crowd. And Madame Désagneaux at last had to stop, look back, and call to them: "Come on, or we shall lose one another!"

As they drew near, Pierre heard the girl'exclaim: "Madame is so very busy; speak to her before we leave." And Gérard there-upon replied: "It is understood. You have made me very happy, mademoiselle."

Thus the husband had been secured, the marriage decided upon during this charming promenade among the sights of Lourdes. Raymonde had completed her conquest and Gérard had at last taken a resolution, realising how gay and sensible she was, as she walked beside him leaning on his arm.

M, de Guersaint, however, had raised his eyes, and was heard inquiring: "Are not those people up there, on that balcony, the rich folk who made the journey in the same train as ourselves?-You know whom I mean, that lady who is so very ill, and whose husband and sister accompany her?"

He was alluding to the Dieulafays; and they indeed were the persons whom he now saw on the balcony of a suite of rooms which they had rented in a new house overlooking the lawns of the Rosary. They here occupied a first-floor, furnished with all the luxury that Lourdes could provide, carpets, hangings, mirrors, and many other things, without mentioning a staff of servants despatched beforehand from Paris. As the weather was so fine that afternoon, the large armchair on which lay the poor ailing woman had been rolled on to the balcony. You could see her there, clad in a lace peignoir. Her husband, always correctly attired in a black frock-coat, stood beside her on her right hand, whilst her sister, in a delightful pale mauve gown, sat on her left, smiling and leaning over every now and then so as to speak to her, but apparently receiving no reply.

"Oh!" declared little Madame Désagneaux, "I have often heard people speak of Madame Jousseur, that lady in mauve. She is the wife of a diplomatist who neglects her, it seems, in spite of her great beauty; and last year there was a great deal of talk about her fancy for a young colonel who is well known in Parisian society. It is said, however, in Catholic salons that her religious principles enabled her to conquer it."

They all five remained there, looking up at the balcony. "To think," resumed Madame Desagneaux, "that her sister, poor woman, was once her living portrait. And, indeed, there was an they scarcely, dare to move. And the unhappy womant." her flesh wasted away, reduced to a livid, boneless thing which woman except that she is above instead of under ground-with Dieulatay's tace. And now you see her-no different from a dead expression of greater kindliness and more gentle gaiety on Madame all the jewellery given her on the occasion of her wedding to offer who had been married seareely two years previously, had brought Raymonde thereupon assured the others that Madame Digulafay, been touched as yet, for the sufferer's condition seemed, if anystudded with gems and a large sum of money destined for the relief of the poor. However, the Blessed Virgin could not have assertion, saying that the jewellery had been handed over to the treasurer of the Basilica that very morning with a golden lantern it as a gift to Our Lady of Lourdes, and Cerard confirmed this thing, to be worse,

her—her sister who had forsaken her society triumphs, her hus-band who had forgotten his financial business, his millions dis-persed throughout the world—inereased, by their irreproachable The two dear ones who were so tenderly watching over Lourdes mob which was feasting and laughing in the Sunday suncreature lying there high above the merry-making throng, the young woman on that handsome balcony, that woeful wealthy From that moment Pierre no longer beheld aught save that exceedingly wealthy and exceedingly wretched. However, lingering in this wise on the footway with their eyes demeanour, the wocfulness of the group which they thus formed on high, above all other heads, and face to face with the lovely valley. For Pierre they alone remained, and they were

Lourdes, and who were delighted with the fine weather and of Pau, Bareges and Cauterets, whom curiosity had attracted to occupants of these carriages were tourists, visitors to the waters were driven at a fast trot, and whose bells jingled merrily. coming up, for the most part landaus drawn by four horses, which down and run over, for at every moment fresh vehicles were upturned, the five promenaders narrowly escaped being knocked off again, laughing, and well pleased at having seen it all. In this wise families in light attire, bands of young women with bright parasols, darted hither and thither among the grey, neutralthe Crotto and the Basilica in seaside costumes, they would start quite inspirited by their rapid drive across the mountains. They would remain at Lourdes only a few hours, after hastening to society deign to come and amuse themselves. manner, the aspect of a fair-day mob, anidst which folks of good tinted crowd of pilgrims, imparting to it, in a yet more pronounced women, the whole party smiling and animated. Every c who had just alighted from a landau with three othe Berthe?" And thereupon slie embraced a tall, charming bereis All at once Madame Desagneaux raised a cry: "What is it rem talking at once and all sorts of merry exclamations rang out, in the delight they felt at meeting in this fashion. "Ohl we are at Cauterets, my dear," said the tall brunette. "And as everybody comes here, we decided to come all four together. And your husband, is he here with you?"

Madame Désagneaux began protesting: "Of course not," said she. "He is at Trouville, as you ought to know. I shall start to join him on Thursday."

"Yes, yes, of course" resumed the tall brunette, who, like her friend, seemed to be an amiable, giddy creature, "I was forgetting; you are here with the pilgrimage."

Then Madame Désagneaux offered to guide her friends, promising to show them everything of interest in less than a couple of hours; and turning to Raymonde, who stood by, smiling, she added: "Come with us, my dear; your mother won't be anxious."

The ladies and Pierre and M. de Guersaint thereupon exchanged hows; and Gérard also took leave, tenderly pressing Raymonde's hand, with his eyes fixed on hers, as though to pledge himself definitively. The woman swiftly departed directing their steps towards the Grotto, and when Gérard also had gone off, returning to his duties, M. de Guersaint said to Pierre: "And the hairdresser on the Place du Mareadal, I really must go and see him. You will come with me, won't you?"

"Of course I will go wherever you like. I am quite at your disposal as Marie does not need us."

Following the pathways between the large lawns which stretch out in front of the Rosary, they reached the new bridge, where they had another encounter, this time with Abbé Des Hermoises, who was acting as guide to two young married ladies who had arrived that morning from Tarbes. Walking between them with the gallant air of a society priest, he was showing them Lourdes and explaining it to them, keeping them well away, however, from its.more repugnant features, its poor and its ailing folk, its odour of low misery, which, it must be admitted, had well-nigh disappeared that fine, sunshiny day. At the first word which M. de Guersaint addressed to him with respect to the hiring of a vehicle for the trip to Gavarnic, tho Abbé was seized with a dread lest he should be obliged to leave his pretty lady-visitors: "As you please, my dear sir," he replied. "Kindly attend to the matter, and—you are quite right, make the cheapest arrangements possible, for I shall have two ecclesiastics of small means with me. There will be four of us. Let me know at the hotel this evening at what hour we shall start."

Thereupon he again joined his lady-friends, and led them towards the Grotto, following the shady path which skirts the Gave, a cool, sequestered path well suited for lovers' walks.

Feeling somewhat tired, Pierre had remained apart from the others, leaning against the parapet of the new bridge. And now no more than he did himself, and yet, like himself, honestly fulfilled their mission as guides and consolers!

"This boulevard is a new one, you know," said M. de Guersaint, all at once raising his voice. "The number of houses built during the last twenty years is almost beyond belief. There is quite a new town here."

The Lapaea flowed along behind the buildings on their right, and their euriosity inducing them to turn into a narrow lane, they eame upon some strange old structures on the margin of the nar-Several ancient mills here displayed their wheels; row stream. among them one which Monseigneur Laurence had given to Bernadette's parents after the apparitions. Tourists, moreover, were here shown the pretended abode of Bernadette, a hovel whither the Soubirous family had removed on leaving the Rue des Petits Fossés, and in which the young girl, as she was already boarding with the Sisters of Nevers, ean have but seldom slept. At last, by way of the Rue Basse, Pierre and his companion reached the Place du Marcadal.

This was a long, triangular, open space, the most animated and luxurious of the squares of the old town, the one where the cafés, the ehemists', all the finest shops were situated. And, among the latter, one showed conspicuously, coloured as it was a lively green, adorned with lofty mirrors, and surmounted by a broad hoard bearing in gilt letters the inscription: "Cazaban, Hair-dresser."

M. de Guersaint and Pierre went in, but there was nobody in the salon and they had to wait. A terrible elatter of forks resounded from the adjoining room, an ordinary dining-room transformed into a table d'hôte, in which some twenty people were having déjeuner although it was already two o'clock. The afternoon was progressing, and yet people were still eating from one to the other end of Lourdes. Like every other householder in the town, whatever his religious convictions might be, Cazaban, in the pilgrimage season, let his bedrooms, surrendered his diningroom, and sought refuge in his eellar, where, heaped up with his family, he ate and slept, although this unventilated hole was no more than three yards square. However, the passion for trading and money-making earried all before it; at pilgrimage time the whole population disappeared like that of a conquered city, surrendering even the beds of its women and its children to the pilgrims, seating them at its tables, and supplying them with food. "Is there nobody here?" ealled M. de Guersaint after waiting a moment.

At last a little man made his appearance, Cazaban himself, a type of the knotty but active Pyrenean, with a long face, prominent eheek bones, and a sunburnt complexion, spotted here and there with red. His big glittering eyes never remained still; and the whole of his spare little figure quivered with incessant exuberance of speech and gesture, pardon for keeping you waiting, but my assistant has gone out, and I was in there with my boarders. If you will kindly sit down, "For you, monsieur-a shave, cli?" said lie. "I must beg your word had seated himself in a corner and taken up a newspaper, nervously, however, at the eassock worn by Pierre, who without a stir up the lather and strop the razor. He had glanced rather Thereupon, deigning to operate in person, Cazaban began to in the pernsal of which lie appeared to be absorbed.

I will attend to you at once.

out of politeness. However, I owe myself to my customers as well, do I not? One must try to please everybody. You can hear them, ch? I was staying with them นอนแอไอก 03 long time at the Crotto, monsieur, that they have searcely sat down "My boarders lingered this morning such a began to chatter: suffering for Cazaban, and whilst lathering his eustonier's chin he A short interval of silence followed; but it was fraught with

M. de Guersaint, who also was fond of a chat, thereupon began to question him: "You lodge some of the pilgrims, I suppose?"

"Oh! we all lodge some of them, monsieur; it is necessary for the town, replied the barber.

And you accompany them to the Grotto?"

", yniblind five years past I have not been in that new town which they are he answered with an air of dignity; "Never, monsieur, nevert For At this, however, Cazaban revolted, and holding up his razor,

"hi lo buorg m'i lio plantasmagorial Ohl I've never concealed itl I was already a republican and a freethinker in the days of the Empire. There vivere darely four men of those views in the 'whole town at that vietory. "Well, monsieur, opinions are free, are they not? said he "I respect yours, but for my part I don't believe in all that lated to render him prudent; nevertheless his tongue won the the red cross pinned on M. de Cuershint's Jacket was also calcu-Pierre, whose face was hidden by the newspaper. The style of T He was still seeking to restrain himself, and again glauced at three weeks at Lourdes each year? Moreover, you could divine had they not robbed him of two tenants, two old ladies, who spent wrathful with the Blue Sisters of the Immaculate Conception, for as with the hotel and lodging-house keepers. And he was also in which they competed with those who sold those articles as well in tapers, chaplets, prints, and erueifixes, for the disloyal manner To begin with, he brought the same charges as Majesté against forth from his mouth, a stream which seemed to be incrhaustible quite triumphant. From that moment a stream of words poured He had begun to shave M. de Cuersaint's left cheek and was within him all the slowly accumulated, overflowing spite with which the old town regarded the new town—that town which had spring up so quickly on the other side of the castle, that rich city with houses as big as palaces whither flowed all the life, all the luxury, all the money of Lourdes, so that it was incessantly growing larger and wealthier, whilst its elder sister, the poor, antique town of the mountains, with its narrow, grass-grown, deserted streets, seemed near the point of death. Nevertheless the struggle still continued; the old town seemed determined not to die, and, by lodging pilgrims and opening shops on her side, cn-deavoured to compel her ungrateful junior to grant her a share of the spoils. But custom only flowed to the shops which were near the Grotto, and only the poorer pilgrims were willing to lodge so far away; so that the unequal conditions of the struggle intensified the rupture and turned the high town and the low town into two irreconcilable enemies, who preyed upon one another amidst continual intrigues.

"Ah, no! They certainly won't see me at their Grotto," resumed Cazaban with his rageful air. "What an abusive use they make of that Grotto of theirs! They serve it up in every fashion! To think of such idolatry, such gross superstition in the nineteenth century! Just ask them if they have cured a single sufferer belonging to the town during the last twenty years! Yet there are plenty of infirm people crawling about our streets. It was our folk that benefited by the first miracles; but it would seem that the miraculous water has long lost all its power, so far as we are concerned. We are too near it; people have to come from a long distance if they want it to act on them. It's really all too stupid; why, I wouldn't go there even if I were offered a hundred francs!'

Pierre's immobility was doubtless irritating the barber. He had now begun to shave M. de Guersaint's right cheek; and was inveighing against the Fathers of the Immaculate Conception, whose greed for gain was the one cause of all the misunderstanding. These Fathers who were at home there, since they had purchased from the Municipality the land on which they desired to build, did not even earry out the stipulations of the contract they had signed, for there were clauses in it forbidding all trading, such as the sale of the water and of religious articles. Innumerable actions might have been brought against them. But they snapped their fingers, and felt themselves so powerful that they no longer allowed a single offering to go to the parish, but arranged matters so that the whole harvest of money should be garnered by the Grotto and the Basilica.

And, all at once, Cazaban candidly exclaimed: "If they were only reasonable, if they would only share with us!" Then, when M. de Guersaint had washed his face, and reseated himself, the hairdresser resumed: "And if I were to tell you, monsieur, what trance a-piece. And it was agreed that they chould honest man, that he eventually agreed to charge only forty francs. There were four persons in the party, so this would make ten was priced at fifty francs. However, he was so pleased at having talked so much, and so flattered at hearing himself called an he consented to take the order. A pair-horse landau for Gavarine dresser declined to enter into the matter, pretending that they must apply to his brother at the Champ Commun; but at last The architect rose, and it was only now that he began to speak of the conveyance which he wished to hire. At first the hair-"There you are, monsieur" Guergaint's hair,

Then relapsing into silence, he finished cutting M. de -issodus suousiod sind he year gowe of ilynoid as orited guit Seeing that Pierre was listening, Cazaban made a final threaten-nations should flock there for a pestilence to break out. they desired that the whole countryside should be poisoned in this wise by hore and human filth? Yet it had sufficed that the all the fervent purity of those who had first begun the work! Had wild primitive grotto, when one thought of all the naive faith. thought of Bernadette, the pure candid girl kneeling before the And what a terrible result it seemed when one evil examples, thience of the conflux of thousands of people, the contagion of such a great enforced increase of wealth, by the ever-growing for-rent of strangers sweeping through it, by the fatal rotting incorrupted, demoralised by the circulation of so much money, by so honest and so pious in its tranquil solitude, and new Lourdes Greatly struck by these remarks, Pierre had let his newspaper fall and begun to listen. It was now, for the first time, that he fully realised the difference between the two Lourdes—old Lourdes come to their Crotto and their Basilical" honest new town which they have given us with the crowds that recking with grossness and vice-and you can form an idea of the population as soon as the first fine weather sets in-the coachinen, the hawkers, the eantine keepers, all the low-class wandering folk add to all this the suspicious floating element which swells the men don't need to go elsewhere nowadays. No, indeed! yuq and, instead of working during the winter, simply wait for the return of the pilgrimage season. And I assure you that the young bold girls abouth They make a lot of money, acquire lazy habits, must have seen them eatching hold of the passers-by and thrusting their goods into their hands! It is really shameful to see so many non pur sandent themselves with selling eandles and nosegays; and vou manners are no longer the same. Nowadays nearly all the girls generally had to go elsewhere. But times have changed, our ber that in my young days when a young man was wicked he girls here conducted themselves properly, I assure you. I remeinthey have done with our poor town! Forty years ago all the young about two in the morning, so that they might get back at Lourdes at a tolerably early hour on the Monday evening.

"The landau will be outside the Hotel of the Apparitions at the appointed time," repeated Cazaban in his emphatic way.

may rely on me, monsieur."

Then he began to listen. The clatter of crockery did not cease resounding in the adjoining room. People were still eating there with that impulsive voracity which had spread from one to the other end of Lourdes. And all at once a voice was heard calling for more bread.

"Excuse me," hastily resumed Cazaban, "my boarders want me." And thereupon he rushed away, his hands still greasy through fingering the comb.

. The door remained open for a second, and on the walls of the . dining-room Pierre espied various religious prints, and notably a view of the Grotto, which surprised him; in all probability, however, the hairdresser only hung these engravings there during the pilgrimage season by way of pleasing his boarders.

It was now nearly three o'clock. When the young priest and M. de Guersaint got outside they were astonished at the loud pealing of bells which was flying through the air. The parish church had responded to the first stroke of vespers chiming at the Basiliea; and now all the convents, one after another, were contributing to the swelling peals. The crystalline notes of the bell. of the Carmelites mingled with the grave notes of the bell of the Immaculate Conception; and all the joyous bells of the Sisters of Nevers and the Dominicans were jingling together. In this wise, from morning till evening on fine days of festivity, the chimes winged their flight above the house-roofs of Lourdes. And nothing could have been gayer than that sonorous melody resounding in the broad blue heavens above the gluttonous town, which had at last lunched, and was now comfortably digesting as it strolled about in the sunlight.

Ш

THE NIGHT PROCESSION

As soon as night had fallen, Marie, still lying on her bed at the . Hospital of Our Lady of Dolours, became extremely impatient, for she had learnt through Madame de Jonquière that Baron Suire had obtained from Father Fourcade the necessary permission for her to spend the night in front of the Grotto. Thus she kept on yet nine o'clock?" questioning Sister Hyacinthe, asking her: "Pray, Sister, is it not break, for the Cave is close by, and the mornings are very fresh, Here is a nice woollen shawl for you to wrap round you at day-"No, my child, it is searcely half-past eight," was the reply.

Mon Dieu, how happy I am; how delightful it will be to spend so little herel' replied Marie; "I cannot be worse off out of doors. you know, in these mountainous parts." "Ohl but the nights are so lovely, Sister, and besides, I sleep liked to grant it, as several sufferers had died during the long been granted to Marie; for nowadays the reverend Fathers searcely powerful protection was needed to obtain such a favour as had the supreme beatitude. It was said that in the deep pencefulness of night the chosen ones undoubtedly beheld the Virgin, but petore the Crotto all night long was the most inestable of joys, The entire ward was lealous of her, for to remain in prayer the whole night with the Blessed Virgin."

before you are brought back here, won't you, my child?" resunned You will take the Sacrament at the Crotto to-morrow morning. vigil, falling asleep, as it were, in the midst of their eestasy.

would take part in it, each carrying a lighted taper: the nocturnal marvels of the sky would be revealed; the stars would descend indeed, as was seldom seen. Nearly thirty thousand pilgrims would be tematkably splendid such. 'piès sem qi ່າຊີແກນວ່າ ວ every night, but the Sunday one was always the linest, and that only started at once. The eerenionies concluded with a procession procession, which she would see from beginning to end it she forgotten her? The others were now talking to her of the night the girl wondered whether he, usually so punchal, could have However, nine o'elock at last struck, and, Pierre not arriving, Sister Hyacinthe.

musple to see any of those wonders.

fate; what a wretched lot was theirs, to be fied to their beds, upon earth. At this thought the sufferers hegan to be unit their

Thake hastell At last Madamie de Jonquière approached Marie's bed: "My dear girl," said she, "here is your father with Monsieur l'Abbé," : Radiant with delight, the girl at once forgot her wenry waiting. "Ohl pray let us make haste, Pierre," she exclaimed, "pray let us along the street, all bending their steps towards the Green but they formed a discreet, pensive crowd, with naugh perfumes from the mountains. Many pilgrims were hurring atmosphere was exquisitely mild and pure, fragrant with the looked like deep blue velvet, spingled with diamonds, and the The night was moonless, but extremely beautiful; the vault above star-studded heavens, whilst M. de Guersaint walked beside it. himself to the little ear, which gently rolled along, under the They carried her down the stairs, and the young priest hameseed fair-field, lounging character of the daytime throng. And, as soon as the Plateau de la Merlasse was reached, the darkness spread out, you entered into a great lake of shadows formed by the stretching lawns and lofty trees, and saw nothing rising on high save the black, tapering spire of the Basilica.

Pierre grew rather anxious on finding that the crowd became more and more compact as he advanced. Already on reaching the Place du Rosaire it was difficult to take another forward step. There is no hope of getting to the Grotto yet awhile," he said. "The best course would be to turn into one of the pathways behind the pilgrims' shelter-house and wait there."

Marie, however, greatly desired to see the procession start. "Oh! pray try to go as far as the Gave," said she. "I shall then sce everything from at distance; I don't want to go near."

M. de Guersaint, who was equally inquisitive, seconded this proposal. "Don't be uneasy," he said to Pierre. "I am here behind, and will take care to let nobody jostle her."

Pierre had to begin pulling the little vehicle again. It took 'him a quarter of an hour to pass under one of the arches of the inclined way on the left hand, so great was the crush of pilgrims at that point. Then, taking a somewhat oblique course, he ended by reaching the quay beside the Gave, where there were only some spectators standing on the sidewalk, so that he was able to advance another fifty yards. At last he halted, and backed the little car against the quay parapet, in full view of the Grotto. "Will you be all right here?" he asked.

"Oh yes, thank you. Only you must sit me up; I shall then be able to see much better."

... M. de Guersaint raised her into a sitting posture, and then for his part climbed upon the stonework running from one to the other end of the quay. A mob of inquisitive people had already scaled it in part, like sightseers waiting for a display of fireworks; and they were all raising themselves on tip-toe, and craning their necks to get a better view. Pierre himself at last grew interested, although there was, so far, little to see.

Some thirty thousand people were assembled, and every moment there were fresh arrivals. All carried candles, the lower parts of which were wrapped in white paper, on which a picture of Out Lady of Lourdes was printed in blue ink. However, these candles were not yet lighted, and the only illumination that you perceived above the billowy sea of heads was the bright, forge-like glow of the taper-lighted Grotto. A great buzzing arose, whiffs of human breath blew hither and thither, and these alone enabled you to realise that thousands of serried, stifling creatures were gathered together in the black depths, like a living sea that was ever eddying and spreading. There were even people hidden away under the trees beyond the Grotto, in distant recesses of the darkness of which one had no suspicion.

flames of a gigantic brasier. from one to the other end of the promenade, the small yellow number till they obseured the bright glow of the Grotto and spread, being lighted one by one, their beams gradually increasing in The thirty thousand tapers were ing amidst the constellations. other points there were meteoric trails, milky ways, so to say, flowden sparks of light spangling the obseurity at random. Their number rapidly increased, eyots of stars were formed, whilst at At last a few tapers began to shine forth here and there, like sud-

the resurrection of the humble, the bright avakening of the souls "Ohl how beautiful it is, Pierrel" murmured Marie; "it is like

"Do you see those two trails of light sioned artistie satisfaction. It is superb, superbl" repeated M. de Guersaint with impas-".100g off, 10

He was reflecting upon her words. There was truth Pierre's feelings, however, had been touched by what Marie had yonder, which intersect one another and form a cross?"

The trees, illumined from below, were intensely the daytime. In the vieinity of the Grotto one could see now as clearly as in "do you see that one which has just begun to flicker, all by itself, far away—do you see it, Marie? Do you see how it floats and slowly appreaches until it is merged in the great lake of light?" dency. Fresh ones were continually appearing, faither and farther invay, like waits and strays. "Ahl" murmured the young priest, their great number that supplied the effulgence, the sunlike resplenin them. Taken singly, those slender flames, those mere speeks of light, were modest and unobtrusive, like the lowly, it was only pale fronts of their convents amidst their sombre foliage. sides aeross the Cave were likewise brightened, and displayed the now shone out, quite white, against the black sky; whilst the hillreflection ascended to the rock, even to the Basiliea, whose spire and silken cords showed with vivid distinctness. And the great brasier were some motionless banners, whose embroidered saints green, like the painted trees in stage seenery. Above the moving

Then the banners began to oscillate, and flow away in a river. starry sparkling as though it were about to burst from its bed and lake, in which each burning wick was like a little wave, rolled its The flaming There came yet another moment of uncertainty.

a tone of disappointment. "Ohl so they won't pass this way!" exclaimed M. de Cuersaint in soon it regular motion set in.

on the right hand, and then spread out through the gardens. afterwards pass behind the Basilica, descend by the inclined way road-constructed at great cost up the hillside-and that it would plained that the procession would first of all ascend the serpentine Pierre, who had informed himself on the matter, thereupon ex-

"Look!" said he; "you can see the forenost tapers ascending amidst the greenery."

Then came an enchanting spectacle. Little flickering lights detached themselves from the great bed of fire, and began gently rising, without it being possible for one to tell at that distance what connected them with the earth. They moved upward, looking in the darkness like golden particles of the sun. And soon they formed an oblique streak, a streak which suddenly twisted, then extended again until it curved once more. At last the whole hillside was streaked by a flaming zigzag, resembling those lightning flashes which you see falling from black skies in cheap engravings. But, unlike the lightning, the luminous trail did not fade away; the little lights still went onward in the same slow, gentle, gliding man-Only for a moment, at rare intervals, was there a sudden cclipse; the procession, no doubt, was then passing behind some clump of trees. But, farther on, the tapers beamed forth afresh, rising heavenward by an intricate path, which incessantly diverged and then started upward again. At last, however, the time came when the lights no longer ascended, for they had reached the summit of the hill and begun to disappear at the last turn of the road.

Exclamations were rising from the crowd. "They are passing behind the Basilica," said one. "Oh! it will take them twenty minutes before they begin coming down on the other side," remarked another. "Yes, madame," said a third, "there are thirty thousand of them. and an hour will go by before the last of them leaves the Grotto."

Ever since the start a sound of chanting had risen above the low rumbling of the crowd. The hymn of Bernadette was being sung, those sixty couplets between which the Angelic Salutation, with its all-besetting rhythm, was ever returning as a refrain. When the sixty couplets were finished they were sung again; and that lullaby of "Ave, ave, ave, Marial" came back incessantly, stupefying the mind, and gradually transporting those thousands of beings into a kind of wide-awake dream, with a vision of Paradise before their eyes. And, indeed, at night-time when they were asleep, their beds would rock to the eternal tune, which they still and ever continued singing.

"Are we going to stop here?" asked M. de Guersaint, who speedily got tired of remaining in any one spot. "We see nothing but the same thing over and over again."

Maric, who had informed herself by listening to what was said in the crowd, thereupon exclaimed: "You were quite right, Pierre; it would be much better to go back yonder under the trees. I so much wish to see everything."

"Yes, certainly; we will seek a spot whence you may see it all," replied the priest. "The only difficulty lies in getting away from herc."

Indeed they were now enclosed within the mob of sightseers;

and, in order to secure a passage, Pierre with stubborn perseverance waves which never seemed to diminish, although the procession of flame spread out before the Crotto, that lake of little sparkling little conveyance so that it might not be upset by the jostling; whilst Maric turned her head, still endeavouring to see the sheet M. de Gucrsaint meantime brought up the rear, screening the had to keep on begging a little room for a suffering girl.

eanticle with its besetting refrain, and they only saw the reflection one of the arches, on a deserted spot where they were able to breathe for a moment. They now heard nothing but the distant At last they all three found themselves out of the crowd, near continued to flow from it without a pause.

hood of the Basilica. of the tapers, hovering like a luminous cloud in the neighbour-

"The servant at the hotel told me so this morning. "The best plan would be to climb to the Calvary," said M. do

But they could not think of making the ascent. From up there, it seems, the scene is fairy-like."

work in the darkness amidst all the scrambling." should, have to come down again, and that would be dangerous "Besides, we emmerated the difficulties. "How could we hois such a height with Marie's conveyance?" he asked, "How could we hoist ourselves to Pierre at once

So they started off, and reached the where it was very mild. Marie herself preferred to remain under the trees in the gardens, ecrable taste. compassed it with a gaudy splendour; and despite all his piety M. de Guersaint could not help finding these decorations in exwas illuminated by means of blue and yellow globes which encsplanade in front of the great crowned statue of the Virgin. It shrubs yonder." "Therel" exclaimed Marie, "a good place would be near those peic no strength left in my legs." Then, growing anxious about his daughter, he inquired: "Shall I cover you up? It is very cool the regulations may be I shall sit on the grass for a moment. I ve "I sec nothing as yet," he muttered, "so whateyer risen on tiptoc. In his impatience to see the first tapers reappear as soon as they should have passed behind the Basilica, M. de Cuersaint had dense shade which fell from the big plane-trees bordering the path. nopody there as yet, and one could enjoy deep peacefulness in the prevailed there by reason of the vicinity of the Gave. There was unabled them to see the procession descend by the gradient-way on the left liand, and watch it as it passed between the lawns to the new bridge and back again. Moreover, a delightful freshness and the spot was indeed an excellent one for their purpose, as it She was pointing to a shrubbery near the pilgrims' shelter-house;

"Oh nol I'm not cold, father!" answered Marie, "I feel so happy. It is long since I breathed such sweet air. There must be some roses about-ean't you smell that delicious perfume?" And turning to Pierre she asked: "Where are the roses, my friend? Can you see them?"

When M. dc Guersaint had seated himself on the grass near the little vehicle, it occurred to Pierre to see if there was not some bed of roses near at hand. But it was in vain that he explored the dark lawns; he could only distinguish sundry elumps of evergreens. And, as he passed in front of the pilgrims' shelter-house on his way back, curiosity prompted him to enter it.

This building formed a long and lofty hall, lighted by large windows upon two sides. With bare walls and a stone pavement, it contained no other furniture than a number of benehes, which stood here and there in haphazard fashion. There was neither table nor shelf, so that the homeless pilgrims who had sought refuge there had piled up their baskets, pareels, and valises in the window embrasures. Moreover, the place was apparently empty; the poor folk that it sheltered had no doubt joined the procession. Nevertheless, although the door stood wide open, an almost unbearable smell reigned inside. The very walls seemed imprognated with an odour of poverty, and in spite of the bright sunshine which had prevailed during the day, the flagstones were quite damp, soiled and soaked with expectorations, spilt wine, and grease. This mess had been made by the poorer pilgrims, who with their dirty skins and wretched rags lived in the hall, eating and sleeping in heaps on the benches.

Pierre speedily came to the eonelusion that the pleasant smell of roses must emanate from some other spot; still, he was making the round of the hall, which was lighted by four smoky lanterns, and which he believed to be altogether unoccupied, when, against the left-hand wall, he was surprised to espy the vague figure of a woman in black, with what seemed to be a white pareel lying on her lap. She was all alone in that solitude, and did not stir; however, her eyes were wide open.

He drew near and recognised Madame Vincent. She addressed him in a deep, broken voice: "Rose has suffered so dreadfully to-day! Since daybreak she has not ceased moaning. And so, as she fell asleep a couple of hours ago, I haven't dared to stir for fear lest she should awake and suffer again."

Thus the poor woman remained motionless, martyr-mother that she was, having for long months held her daughter in her arms in this fashion, in the stubborn hope of euring her. In her arms, too, she had brought her to Lourdes; in her arms she had carried her to the Grotto; in her arms she had rocked her to sleep, having neither a room of her own, nor even a hospital bed at her disposal.

"Isn't the poor little thing any better?" asked Pierre, whose heart ached at the sight.

"No, Monsieur l'Abbé; No, I think not."

"But you are very badly off here on this bench. You should have made an application to the pilgrimage managers instead of

".nistres would have been found for your little girl, at any rate; that's remaining like this in the street, as it were. Some accommodation thirty sous when I left Paris, and I still have ten left. All I need her stiffed voice she continued: "I am not penniless, cears rolled down the poor woman's motionless cheeks, and in allowed to stay with her? No, no, I prefer to have her on my knees; it seems to me that it will end by curing her. Two big She is all right on my lap. And besides, should I have been "Ohl what would have been the use of it, Monsieur l'Abbé?

milk even. I have enough to last me till we go back, and if she is a little bread, and she, poor darling, can no longer drink any gets well again, oh! we shall be rich, rich, rich!"

pray all night long without moving from here. She will be She had leant forward while speaking, and, by the flickering light of a lantern nearby, gazed at flose, who was breathing faintly, with parted lips. "You see how soundly she is sleeping," resumed the unhappy mother. "Surely the Blessed Virgin will take pity on her and cure her, won't she, Monsieur LAbbe? We only have one day left; still, I don't despair; and I shall again may near all may be made to be mediant pray all present the might long without moving them.

he also might weep, now went away. "Yes, yes, my poor woman, we must hope, still hope," said he, as he left her there among the scattered benefies, in that deserted, majodorous hall. "Yes, yes, my poor Infinite pity was filling the heart of Pierre, who, fearing that cured to-morrow; we must live till then."

she prayed ardently. And in deepest grief, with closed lips, the poor little sufferer. so motionless in her painful maternal passion as to hold her own breath, fearful lest the heaving of her bosom should avaken there are none." seen, so he simply answered: "No, I have searched the lawns. He did not wish to sadden her by telling her what he had "Well, and those roses? Are there any near here?"

On Pierre returning to Marie's side, the grit inquired of him.

you? At this moment it is wonderfully strong, as though all the fung is both so sweet and penetrating. You can smell it, can't "How singular!" she rejoined, in a thoughtful way. "The per-saint had risen to his feet again on seeing some specks of 121 A low exclamation from her father interrupted her. At de Geerroses of paradise were flowering around us in the darkness."

"At last here they come!" said he. shine out above the gradient-wavs on the left side of the Bashen elevation, and to emerge, as it were, from the black degree or a thing except these luminous points, which seemed to be at a firm in long, wavering double files. The darkness gubin read arter view; and at once the speeks of light began to smarm and It was indeed the head of the procession again appraise it

Unknown. And at the same time the everlasting canticle was again heard, but so lightly, for the procession was far away, that it seemed as yet merely like the rustle of a coming storm, stirring the leaves of the trees.

"Ah! I said so," muttered M. de Guersaint; "one ought to be at the Calvary to see everything." With the obstinacy of a child he kept on returning to his first idea, again and again complaining that they had chosen "the worst possible place."

"But why don't you go up to the Calvary, papa?" at last said Maric. There is still time. Pierre will stay here with me." And with a mournful laugh she added: "Go; you know very well that nobody will run away with me."

He at first refused to act upon the suggestion, but, unable to resist his desire, he all at once fell in with it. And he had to hasten his steps, crossing the lawns at a run. "Don't move," he called: "wait for me under the trees. I will tell you of all that I may see un there.'

Pierre and Marie remained alone in that dim, solitary nook, whence came such a perfume of roses, albeit no roses could be found. And they did not speak, but in silence watched the procession, which was now coming down from the hill with a gentle, continuous, gliding motion.

A double file of quivering stars leapt into view on the left-hand side of the Basilica, and then followed the monumental gradientway, whose curve it gradually described. At that distance you were still unable to see the pilgrims themselves, and you beheld simply those well-disciplined travelling lights tracing geometrical lines amidst the darkness. Under the deep blue heavens, even the buildings at first remained vague, forming but blacker patches against the sky. Little by little, however, as the number of candles increased, the principal architectural lines—the tapering spire of the Basilica, the cyclopean arches of the gradient-ways, the heavy, squat façade of the Rosary-became more distinctly visible. And with that ceaseless torrent of bright sparks, flowing slowly downward with the stubborn persistence of a stream which has overflowed its banks and can be stopped by nothing, there came as it were an aurora, a growing, invading mass of light, which would at last spread its glory over the whole horizon.

"Look, look, Pierrel" cried Marie, in an excess of childish joy. "There is no end to them; fresh ones are ever shining out."

Indeed, the sudden appearances of the little lights continued with mechanical regularity, as though some inexhaustible celestial source were pouring forth all those solar specks. The head of the procession had just reached the gardens, near the crowned statue of the Virgin, so that as yet the double file of flames merely outlined the curves of the Rosary and the broad inclined way. However, the approach of the multitude was foretokened by the perturbation of the atmosphere, by the gusts of human breath coming

Bernadette surging with the clamour of a rising tide, through which, with rhythmical persistence, the refrain of "Ave, ave, ave, from afar; and particularly did the voices swell, the canticle of skin, It s singing it." It seems to me as though my whole body were at last "Ah, that refrain!" muttered Pierre; "it penetrates one's very

Maria," rolled ever in a louder key.

Again did Marie give vent to that childish laugh of hers.

the other night whilst I was asleep. And now it is again taking possession of me, rocking me, waiting me above the ground." Then she broke off to say: "Here they come, just across the lawn, is true," said she; "it follows me about everywhere. I heard it left; the buildings and the trees assumed a visionary aspect in the A bluish light streamed all around; there was maught but heaven ferring the revolutions of the planets from the empyreum to earth. fallen from on high, rolling its glittering dust of worlds, and transhe fewer stars in the heavens; it was as though a milky way had break; but order was soon re-established, and then the slow, regular, gliding movement set in afresh. There now seemed to luminous lines shook and bent as though they were about to josiling and serambling every now and then, for some of the earth, winding, stretching into the far distance, without the immignse body ever seeming to end. There must have been some scrpent of fire, whose golden coils crept so gently over the black ever excited one's admiration was the eeaseless march of this tapers resembled two long parallel streams of flame. That which hour to execute this movement, during which the double file of came back by a parallel path. It took more than a quarter of an then, turning round the lawn by way of the Breton's Cross, it The procession had entered one of the long straight paths; and for words, and could only repeat: "How beautiful it is! Mon Digul how beautiful it is! Look, Pierre, is it not beautiful?" However, since the procession had been going by at so short A faint sigh of admiration came from Marie. She was at a loss and ever increased, inysterious glow of the thousands of tapers, whose number still carrying the tapors, and at times even recognise them as they passed. First they espied La Grivotte, who, exaggerating her oute, and repeating that she had never felt in better ficulti, had stream of light they could distinguish the figures of the pilgrims stars which no human hand appeared to guide, for amidst the a distance from them it had ceased to be a rhytlimic march of

", su to inort ni

Then the Vignerons appeared; the father at the head of the party, raising his taper on high, and followed by Madam dancing gait in the cool night air, which often made her shiver instated upon taking part in the ceremony despite the latenes of the hour; and she still retained her excited demeanour, he Unknown. And at the same time the everlasting eanticle was again heard, but so lightly, for the procession was far away, that it seemed as yet merely like the rustle of a coming storm, stirring the leaves of the trees.

"Ah! I said so," muttered M. de Guersaint; "one ought to be at the Calvary to see everything." With the obstinacy of a child

he kept on returning to his first idea, again and again complaining that they had chosen "the worst possible place."

"But why don't you go up to the Calvary, papa?" at last said Marie. There is still time. Pierre will stay here with me." And with a mournful laugh she added: "Go; you know very well that nobody will run away with me."

He at first refused to act upon the suggestion, but, unable to resist his desire, he all at once fell in with it. And he had to hasten his steps, crossing the lawns at a run. "Don't move," he called: "wait for me under the trees. I will tell you of all that I may see up there."

Pierre and Marie remained alone in that dim, solitary nook, whence came such a perfume of roses, albeit no roses could be found. And they did not speak, but in silence watched the procession, which was now coming down from the hill with a gentle,

continuous, gliding motion.

A double file of quivering stars leapt into view on the left-hand side of the Basilica, and then followed the monumental gradientway, whose curve it gradually described. At that distance you were still unable to see the pilgrims themselves, and you beheld simply those well-disciplined travelling lights tracing geometrical lines amidst the darkness. Under the deep blue heavens, even the buildings at first remained vague, forming but blacker patches against the sky. Little by little, however, as the number of candles increased, the principal architectural lines—the tapering spire of the Basilica, the cyclopean arches of the gradient-ways, the heavy, squat façade of the Rosary-became more distinctly visible. And with that ceaseless torrent of bright sparks, flowing slowly downward with the stubborn persistence of a stream which has overflowed its banks and ean be stopped by nothing, there came as it were an aurora, a growing, invading mass of light, which would at last spread its glory over the whole horizon.

"Look, look, Pierre!" eried Marie, in an excess of childish joy.

"There is no end to them; fresh ones are ever shining out."

Indeed, the sudden appearances of the little lights continued with mechanical regularity, as though some inexhaustible celestial source were pouring forth all those solar specks. The head of the procession had just reached the gardens, near the crowned statue of the Virgin, so that as yet the double file of flames merely outlined the curves of the Rosary and the broad inclined way. However, the approach of the multitude was foretokened by the perturbation of the atmosphere, by the gusts of human breath coming

Bernadeltte sum particularly did me volces sweig inc. cannots which, with rhythmical persistence, the refrain of "Ave, ave, ave, Alaria," rolled ever in a louder key.

"Ah, that refrain," muttered Pierre; "it penetrates one's very skin. It seems to me as though my whole body were at last singular, it seems to me as though my whole body were at last singular. from afar; and particularly did the voices swell, the eantiele of the other night whilst I was asleep. And now it is again taking is true," said she; "it follows me about everywhere. I heard it Again did Marie give vent to that childish laugh of hers. "It "Ji Birigais

"su do dnori ni possession of me, rocking me, waiting me above the ground." Then she broke off to say: "Here they come, just across the lawn, and ever increased. inysterious glow of the thousands of tapers, whose number still left; the buildings and the trees assumed a visionary aspect in the A bluish light streamed all around; there was naught but heaven terring the revolutions of the planets from the empyrean to earth. fallen from on high, rolling its glittering dust of worlds, and transluminous lines shook and bent as though they were about to break; but order was soon re-established, and then the slow, regular, gliding movement set in affesh. There now seemed to be fewer stars in the heavens; it was as though a milky way had teller from the contraction of the lostling and serambling every now and then, for some of the earth, winding, stretching into the far distance, without the immense body ever seeming to end. There must have been some sembent of fire, whose golden coils erept so gently over the black ever excited one's admiration was the eeaseless march of this tapers resembled two long parallel streams of flame. That which hour to exceute this movement, during which the double file of came back by a parallel path. It took more than a quarter of an then, turning round the lawn by way of the Breton's Cross, it The procession had entered one of the long straight paths; and for words, and could only repeat: "How beautiful it isl Mon Dieul how beautiful it isl Look, Pierre, is it not beautiful?"

Flowever, since the procession had been going by at so short dietore, the procession had been going by at so short dietore, the procession had been going by at so short dietore, the procession had been going by at so short dietore. A faint sigh of admiration came from Marie. She was at a loss party, raising his taper on high, and followed by Madame Vigne-Then the Vignerons appeared; the father at the head of the of the hour, and she still retained her excited demeanour, her dancing gait in the cool night air, which often made her shiyer. insisted upon taking part in the ceremony despite the lateness passed. First they espied La Grivotte, who, exaggerating her cure, and repeating that she had never felt in better health, had carrying the tapers, and at times even recognise them as they stream of light they could distinguish the figures of the pilgrims stars which no human hand appeared to guide, for amidst the distance from them it had eeased to be a thythmie march of anything so extraordinary before!! scenis to exist; it is gigantic, paramount. I really never saw darkness with a perpetual sparkle of moving stars. Nothing class. a monstrance—yes, a real monstrance, the base of which is out-lined by the inclined ways, the stem by the two parallel paths, and the Host by the round lawn which crowns them. It is a unonstrance of burning gold, shining out in the depths of the below reflecting that above, a heaven entirely filled by a single immense constellation. The swarming stars scenn to be lost, to lie in dim far-away depths; and the trail of fire is in form like evening, because you'll see, you'll see. She stopped short, not render him compliant, she added: "I am so pleased that you are going to make that excursionl Only, come pack early to-morrow know that you have to start at two in the morning." Then, to "Father, dear," said Maric tenderly, "since you have come back you ought to go to bed. It is nearly cleven o'elock, and you emotion of an artist.

He was waving his arms, beside himself, overflowing with the

"But I don't wish Pierre to pass the night out here. He will join you by-and-by after he has taken me to the Grotto. I shan't daring to express her conviction that she would be cured.
"You are right, I will go to bed," replied M, de Guersann, quite calmed, "Since Pierre will be with you I shan't feel anxious."

can take me back to the Hospital to-morrow morning." pane any further need of anybody; the first bearer who passes no, Marie, I shall stay. Like you, I shall spend the night at Pierre had not interrupted her, and now he simply said: "no, the Grotto,

But he had spoken those words so gently, and she had detected in them such a dolorous thirst for happiness, that, stirred to the She opened her mouth to insist and express her displeasure.

baA denths of her soul, she stayed her tongue. "Well, well, my children," replied her father, "settle the matter

I know that you are both very sensible. тпо.С поэмдэц

now good night, and don't be at all uneasy about me."

He gave his daughter a long, loving kiss, pressed the young priest's limits, and then went off, disappearing among the serried fring breeze had come down from the mountains, sweeping an ail the odour of strong meats, the greedy Sunday debights, the scoreling, pestilential, fair-field dust which, at an eather hour, all the daytime junketing remained. It seemed as though a pun-What delighted Pierre was that nothing of Place du Rosaire. it was truly sweet to imger there while the tapers continued marching past, and, after a turning movement, assembled on the the spreading trees, she still sitting up in her box, and he kneeling on the grass, with his cloow resting on one of the wheels. And Then they remained alone in their dark, solitary nook under ranks of the procession, which he once more had to cross. had hovered above the town. Overhead there was now only the vast sky, studded with pure stars, and the freshness of the Gave was delicious, whilst the wandering breezes were laden with the perfumes of wild flowers. The mysterious Infinite spread far around in the sovereign peacefulness of night, and nothing of materiality remained save those little candle-flames which the young priest's companion had compared to suffering souls seeking deliverance. All was now exquisitely restful, instinct with unlimited hope. Since Pierre had been there, all the heart-rending memories of the afternoon, of the voracious appetites, the impudent simony, and the poisoning of the old town, had gradually left him, allowing him to savour the divine refreshment of that beautiful night, in which his whole being was steeped as in some revivifying water.

A feeling of infinite sweetness had likewise come over Marie, who murmured: "Ah! how happy Blanche would be to see all these marvels."

She was thinking of her sister, who had been left in Paris amidst all the worries of her hard profession of a teacher forced to run hither and thither giving lessons. And that simple mention of her sister, of whom Marie had not spoken since her arrival at Lourdes, but whose figure now unexpectedly arose in her mind's eye, sufficed to evoke a vision of all the past.

Then, without exchanging a word, Marie and Pierre lived their childhood's days afresh, playing together once more in the neighbouring gardens parted by the quickset hedge. But separation came on the day when he entered the seminary and when she kissed him on the cheeks, vowing that she would never forget him. Years went by, and they found themselves for ever parted: he a priest, she prostrated by illness, no longer with any hope of ever being a woman. That was their whole story—an ardent affection of which they had long been ignorant, then absolute severance, as though they were dead, albeit they lived side by side. They again beheld the sorry lodging whence they had started to come to Lourdes after so much battling, so much discussion—his doubts and her passionate faith, which last had conquered. And it seemed to them truly delightful to find themselves once more quite alone together, in that dark nook on that lovely night, when there were as many stars upon earth as there were in heaven.

Marie had hitherto retained the soul of a child, a spotless soul, as her father said, good and pure among the purest. Strieken low in her thirtcenth year, she had grown no older in mind. Although she was now three-and twenty, she was still a child, a child of thirteen, who had retired within herself, absorbed in the bitter catastrophe which had annihilated her. You could tell this by the frigidity of her glance, by her absent expression, by the haunted air she ever wore, unable as she was to bestow a thought on anything but her calamity. And never was woman's soul more in sacrifice. It was divine enjoyment. "Ah!" murmured Pierre, "how beautiful is this blue night, this ardent desire for one another's cure and happiness, that for a moment they attained to the depths of the love which offers itself other did they become that they forgot themselves, with such an that they would pray for each other, and so absorbed in each clasped hands repeated all those things. They mutually promised like a little child, and beg the all-powerful Mother to restore his lost faith? Without need of any further exchange of words, their supreme effort to believe, that he meant to fall upon his knees when expressing his desire to spend the whole night outside the Crotto, like herself. Was it not that he intended to make a understood what Pierre had wished to say a short time previously, was, indeed, absolutely convinced; she would prevail upon the Blessed Virgin to listen to her; she would soften her, as soon as she should be alone, imploring her face to face. And she well at the Grotto, she would, on the morrow, be cured. Of this she And she knew right well, that after spending a night of rapture Around them nothing subsisted, save the revolving stars. The world, amidst the sovereign enchantment of darkness and mystery. tasted such pure and perfect joy in being together, far from the sing it. Ahl how sweet it was. Mever before, indeed, had they it, coming to meet her own, she, for a long time, continued pres-Her hand sought Pierre's in the darkness, and when she found adorable daughter of suffering, who, despite the growth of her sove that distant awakening of passion, the unconscious love of her thurteenth year, thing, Hence her purity and childishness; hence she was but an sees nor hears anything, possessed, as she was, by the idea of the calamity that had befallen her, the bond which made her a sexless had passed through the crowds like a somnambulist who neither seclusion; and, in past years, when she had been taken from one to the other end of France, from one inland spa to another, she excitement of a superhuman love. Even the rumours of every-day life died away at the door of the room where she lived in works which she was allowed to peruse maintained her in the order to live near her. She never read any novels. The pious ness, she had never gone beyond this dream—that if she had grown up in health, he doubtless would not have become a priest in ing the endless days which she had spent on her couch of wretchedfriend, which for ten long years had sufficed to fill her heart. Durhad had no other romance in life save that tearful farewell to her pure and candid, arrested as it had been in its development. She infinite darkness, which has swopt away all the hideousness of things and beings, this deep, fresh peacefulness, in which I my-self should like to bury my doubts!

His voice died away, and Marie, in her turn, said in a very low earts of fire which were burning away in prayers in order that "Ave, ave, ave, Marial" was like the very crackling of those ased. And the roar of voices incessantly repeating the refrain cended in company with the strains of the cantiele which never savens where the planets had grown pale. A luminous glow ever stirring, but tasting delicious happiness amidst the perfume t the invisible roses. ut the young priest and the girl lingered in their nook forgetfully, the prowl and fall asleep when days of festivity draw to a close. of darkness there swept a rusting sound—the rusting of those Lourdes, far off, there were now only some stray, lost pilgrims equiring their way, in order that they might get to bed. Through ind in hand, hidden away among the trees. In the dim streets ght was falling again, paramount, densely black and extremely alld, when Pierre and Marie perceived that they were still there, The candles had just been extinguished, one by one, and the uls might be saved.

ΛI

THE VICIL

Are you comfortable, Marie?" gently inquired Pierre. "Don't a gathering storm. tolling along beneath the gloomy, boundless sky, now heavy with alone ascended the angry and continuous murmur of the Gave, in which nothing, neither walls nor trees, remained, whilst all great a brightness, the surroundings became lost in a deep shadow rellowering. And the darkness was rendered more dense by so inough all that you could distinguish was a starlike blaze, from the midst of which, with visionary whiteness, emerged the statue of the Virgin in its niche. The hanging foliage assumed an ensembled an inextricable network of lead wood on the point of tead wood on the point of collousaing. nde of lighted tapers, similar to the illumination round a coffin, eated on the benches, but the greater number kneeling as though postrated in prayer. The Grotto shone from afar, with its mulitnidnight, and about a hundred persons were still there, some ind placed her as near as possible to the railing, it was past Witch Pierre dragged Marie in her box to the front of the Crotto, other world, which had seemed to her to come from the Crotto. She had just shivered. But it was only at a breath from the you teel chilly?"

"No, no, I am so comfortable! Only place the shawl over my knees. And-thank you, Pierre-don't be anxious about me. I no longer require any one now that I am with her."

Her voice died away, she was already falling into an costasy, her hands clasped, her eyes raised towards the white statue, in a beatific transfiguration of the whole of her poor suffering face.

Yet Pierre remained a few minutes longer beside her. He would have liked to wrap her in the shawl, for he perceived the trembling of her little wasted hands. But he feared to annoy .her, so confined himself to tucking her in like a child; whilst she, slightely raised, with her elbows on the edges of her box, and her eyes fixed on the Grotto, no longer beheld him.

A bench stood near, and he had just scated himself upon it, intending to collect his thoughts, when his glance fell upon a woman kneeling in the gloom. Dressed in black, she was so slim, so discreet, so unobstrusive, so wrapt in darkness, that at first he had not noticed her. After a while, however, he recognised her as Madame Maze. The thought of the letter which she had received during the day then recurred to him. And the sight of her filled him with pity; he could feel for the forlornness of this solitary woman, who had no physical sore to heal, but only im-plored the Blessed Virgin to relieve her heart-pain by converting her inconstant husband. The letter had no doubt been some harsh reply, for, with bowed head, she seemed almost annihilated, filled with the humility of some poor beaten creature. It was only at night-time that she readily forgot herself there, happy at disappearing, at being able to weep, suffer martyrdom, and implore the return of the lost caresses, for hours together, without any one suspecting her grievous secret. Her lips did not even move; it was her wounded heart which prayed, which desperately begged for its share of love and happiness.

Ah! that inextinguishable thirst for happiness which brought them all there, wounded either in body or in spirit; Pierre also , felt it parching his throat, in an ardent desire to be quenched. He longed to cast himself upon his knees, to beg the divine aid with the same humble faith as that woman. But his limbs were as though tied; he could not find the words he wanted, and it was a relicf when he at last felt someone touch him on the arm "Come with me, Monsieur l'Abbé, if you do not know the Grotto," said a voice. "I will find you a place. It is so pleasant there at this time!'

He raised his head, and recognised Baron Suire, the director of the Hospitality of Our Lady of Salvation. This benevolent and simple man no doubt felt some affection for him. He therefore accepted his offer, and followed him into the Grotto, which was quite empty. The Baron had a key, with which he locked the railing behind them.

"You see, Monsieur l'Abbé," said he, "this is the time when

"laigriV besseld od: night here. The place is deserted, one is quite alone and is it not pleasant? How well one feels oneself to be in the abode of ore daybreak, as I have fallen into the habit of finishing my come to spend a few days at Lourdes, I seldom retire to rest beme can really be comfortable here. For my part, whenever I

but talked on and explained matters with the familiarity of a man ike an old frequenter of the place, somewhat enfeebled by age, but full of genuine affection for this delightful nook. Moreover, in spite of his great piety, he was in no way ill at ease there, he was in no way ill at ease there, He smiled with a kindly air, doing the honours of the Crotto who felt himself to be the friend of Heaven.

two hundred of them which burn together night and day; and "Ahl you are looking at the tapers," he said. "There are about vinter." they end by making the place warm. It is even warm here in prevent persons from slipping. to such a degree did it cover the ground that accidents had occurred, and it had been necessary to spread some mats about to the whole rock, which had become quite greasy to the touch; and with it, whitened by its ever-thickening dust. In fact, it coated which had been heating it for years. And the wax was perpetually dripping like fine snow; the trays of the holders were smothered the stone seemed baked and blackened by the eternal flames ing massive candelabra, stood here and there on the jutting parts of the rock. The vault of the Grotto sank towards the left, where being as large as a man's thigh. And yet other holders, resemblon a level with the ground, upheld the large tapers, which like the pipes of an organ, formed a row of uneven height, some of them was penctrating, he gazed at the large central pyranidal, holder, all bristling with little tapers, and resembling a luminous clipped yew glistening with stars. In the background, a straight holder, odour of the wax. Dazzled by the brilliant light into which he Indeed, Pierre was beginning to feel incommoded by the warm are two more hampers full, which there has not yet been time to remove to the storchouse." we don't husband them; we never run short. Look herel Here upiece; they will continue burning for a month. The smones, which cost but five sous each, only last three hours. The smallest "You see those large ones there," obligingly continued Baron inc. "They are the most expensive, and cost sixty frances during the ecremonics, and finally a very handsome movable altar, which was adorned with engraved silver plates, the gift of a Then he pointed to the furniture, which comprised a harmoninum covered with a cloth, a substantial dresser with several large drawers in which the sacred vestments were kept, some benches and chairs reserved for the privileged few who were admitted during the several factors. LOURDES great lady, and-for fear of injury from dampness-was only brought out on the occasions of remunerative pilgrimages.

Pierre was disturbed by all this well-meant chatter. His religious emotion lost some of its charm. In spite of his lack of faith, he had, on entering, experienced a feeling of agitation, a heaving of the soul, as though the Mystery were about to be revealed to him. It was at the same time both an anxious and a delicious feeling. And he beheld things which deeply stirred him: bunches of flowers, lying in a heap at the Virgin's feet, with the votive offerings of children-little faded shoes, a tiny iron corselet, and a doll-like crutch which almost seemed to be a toy. Beneath the natural ogival cavity in which the apparition had appeared, at the spot where the pilgrims rubbed the chaplets and medals they wished to consecrate, the rock was quite worn away and polished. Millions of ardent lips had pressed kisses on the wall with such intensity of love that the stone was as though ealeined, streaked with black veins, shining like marble.

However, he stopped short at last opposite a eavity in which lay a considerable pile of letters and papers of every description.

"Ah! I was forgetting," hastily resumed Baron Suire; "this is the most interesting part of it. These are the letters which the faithful throw into the Grotto through the railing every day. We gather them up and place them there; and in the winter I amuse myself by glancing through them. You see, we cannot burn them without opening them, for they often contain money-francs, half-francs, and especially postage stamps."

He stirred up the letters, and selecting a few at random, showed the addresses, and opened them to read. Nearly all of them were letters from illiterate persons, with the superscription, "To Our Lady of Lourdes," scrawled on the envelopes in big, irregular handwriting. Many of them contained requests or thanks, incorrectly worded and wondrously spelt; and nothing was more affecting than the nature of some of the petitions: a little brother to be saved, a law-suit to be gained, a lover to be preserved, a marriage to be effected. Other letters, however, were angry ones, taking the Blessed Virgin to task for not having had the politcness to aeknowledge a former communication by granting the writer's prayers. Then there were still others, written in a finer hand, with carefully worded phrases containing confessions and fervent entreaties; and these were from women who confided to the Queen of Heaven things which they dared not even say to a priest in the shadow of the confessional. Finally, one envelope, selected at random, merely contained a photograph; a young girl had sent her portrait to Our Lady of Lourdes, with this dedication: "To my good Mother." In short, they every day received the correspondence of a most powerful Queen, to whom both prayers and scerets were addressed, and who was expected to reply with favours and kindnesses of every kind. The franc and lialf-franc pieces were simple tokens of love to propitiate lier; while, as for the postage stamps, these could only be sent for convenience sake, in lieu of coined money; unless, indeed, they were sent guilelessly, as in the case of a peasant woman who had added a postscript to her letter to say that she enclosed a stamp for the reply.

a stamp for the reply,

"I can assure you," concluded the Baron, "that there are some yety nice ones among them, much less foolish than you might very nice ones among them, much less foolish than you might yety nice ones among them, as a fare one and send woman, and relating it to the Blessed Virgin. She was a married woman, and pand's. Well, Monsieur l'Abbé she overcame it; the Blessed band's. Well, Monsieur l'Abbé she overcame it; the Blessed Virgin answered her by sending her an annour for her chastity, an all-divine power to resist the promptings of her heart." Then an all-divine power to resist the promptings of her heart." Then an all-divine power to resist the promptings of her heart." Then an all-divine power to resist the promptings of her heart." Then an all-divine power to resist the promptings of her heart." Then an all-divine power to resist the promptings of her heart." Then an all-divine power to resist the promptings of her heart." Then an all-divine power to resist the promptings of her heart." Then an all-divine power to resist the promptings of her heart." Then an all-divine power to resist the promptings of her heart." Then an all-divine power to resist the promptings of her heart." Then an all-divine power to resist the promptings of her heart." Then an all-divine power to resist the prompting of the prompt l'Abbé. You will see how comfortable you will be."

Pierre went and placed himself beside him on a bench on the left hand, at the spot where the rock hung lower. This was a deliciously reposeful corner, and neither the one nor the other spoke; a profound silence had ensued, when, behind him, Pierre spoke; a profound silence had ensued, when, behind him, Pierre lieard an indistinct murmur, a light crystalline voice, which seembeard as indistinct the Invisible. He gave a start, which Baron ed to come from the Invisible.

Suire understood.

"That is the spring which you hear," said he; "it is there," "That is the spring which you hear," said he; "it is there,

"That it he spring which you hear," said he; "it is there, underground, below this grating. Would you like to see it?"

And, without waiting for Pierre's reply, he at once bent down to open one of the iron plates protecting the spring, mentioning that it was thus closed up in order to prevent freethinkers from throwing poison into it. For a moment this extraordinary idea quite anisted the priest, but he ended by attributing it entirely to the Baron, who was, indeed, very childish. The latter, meantime, was vainly struggling with the padlock, which opened by a combination of letters and refused to yield to his endeavours, "It than, the harn't been changed. The damp destroys everything. It is singular," he multered; "the word is Rome, and I am positive that, it heart been changed. The damp destroys everything. Every two years or so we are obliged to replace those crutches up there, otherwise they would all rot away. Be good enough to bring me a taper."

By the light of the candle which Pierre then took from one of the holders, he at last succeeded in unfastening the brass padlock, which was covered with octt-de gris. Then, the plate having been raised, the spring appeared to view. Upon a bed of having been raised, the spring appeared to view. Upon a bed of middy gravel, in a fissure of the rock, there was a limpid stream, quite tranquil, but seemingly spreading over a rather large surface. The Baron explained that it had been necessary to conduct it to the fountains through pipes coated with cement; and he even admitted that, behind the piscinas, a large cistem and he even admitted that, behind the piscinas, a large cistem had been dug in which the water was collected during the night, as otherwise the small output of the source would not suffice for the daily requirements.

"Will you taste it?" he suddenly asked. "It is much better here, fresh from the earth."

Pierre did not answer; he was gazing at that tranquil, innocent water, which assumed a moire-like golden sheen in the dancing light of the taper. The falling drops of wax now and again ruffled its surface. And, as he gazed at it, the young priest pondered upon all the mystery it brought with it from the distant mountain slopes.

Come, drink some!" said the Baron, who had already dipped and filled a glass which was kept there handy. The priest had no choice but to empty it; it was good pure water, fresh and transparent, like that which flows from all the lofty uplands of the Pyrenees.

After refastening the padlock, they both returned to the bench. Now and again Pierre could still hear the spring flowing behind him, with a music resembling the gentle warble of an unseen bird. But the Baron was again talking, giving him the history of the Grotto at all times and seasons, in a pathetic babble, replete with pucrile details.

The summer was the roughest season, for then came the great itinerant pilgrimage crowds, with the uproarious fervour of thousands of eager being, all praying and vociferating together. But with the autumn came the rain, those diluvial rains which beat against the Grotto entrance for days together; and with them arrived the pilgrims from remote countries, small, silent, and eestatic bands of Indians, Malays, and even Chinese, who fell upon their knees in the mud at a sign from the missionaries accompanying them. Of all the old provinces of France, it was Brittany that sent the most devout pilgrims, whole parishes arriving together, the men as numerous as the women, and 'all displaying a pious deportment, a simple and unostentatious faith, such as might edify the world. Then came the winter, December with its terrible cold, its dense snow-drifts blocking the mountain ways. But even then families put up at the hotels, and despite everything, faithful worshippers-all those who, fleeing the noise of the world, wished to speak to the Virgin in the tender intimacy of solitude-still came every morning to the Grotto. Among them were some whom no one knew, who appeared directly they felt certain they would be alone there to kneel and love like jealous lovers; and who departed, frightened away by the first suspicion of a crowd. And how warm and pleasant the place was throughout the foul winter weather! In spite of rain and wind and snow, the Grotto still continued flaring. Even during nights of howling tempest, when not a soul was there, it lighted up the empty darkness, blazing like a brazier of love that nothing could extin-

Ah! how he would have liked to fall upon his knees and believe in the miracle, to acquire a certain conviction that that divine water had gushed from the rock solely for the healing of suffering humanity. Had he not come there to prostrate himself and implore the Virgin to restore the faith of his childhood? Why, then, did he not pray, why did he not beseech her to bring him back to grace? His feeling of suffocation increased, the burning tapers dazzled him almost to the point of giddiness. And, all at once, the recollection came to him that for two days past, amidst the great freedom which priests enjoyed at Lourdes, he had neglected to say his mass. He was in a state of sin, and perhaps it was the weight of this transgression which was oppressing his heart. He suffered so much that he was at last compelled to rise from his seat and walk away. He gently closed the gate behind him, leaving Baron Suire still asleep on the bench. Marie, he found, , had not stirred, but was still raised on her elbows, with her ecstatic . eyes uplifted towards the figure of the Virgin.

"How are you, Marie?" asked Pierre. "Don't you feel cold?" She did not reply. He felt her hands, and found them warm and soft, albeit slightly trembling. "It is not the cold which makes you tremble, is it, Maric?" he asked.

In a voice as gentle as a zeplyr she replied: "No, no! let me be; I am so happy! I shall see her, I feel it. Ah! what joy!"

So, after slightly pulling up her shawl, he went forth into the night, a prey to indescribable agitation. Beyond the bright glow of the Grotto was a night as black as ink, a region of darkness, into which he plunged at random. Then, as his eyes became accustomed to this gloom, he found himself near the Gave, and skirted it, following a path shaded by tall trees, where he again came upon a refreshing obscurity. This shade and coolness, both so soothing, now brought him relief. And his only surprise was that he had not fallen on his knees in the Grotto, and prayed, even as Marie was praying, with all the power of his soul. What could be the obstacle within him? Whence came the irresistible revolt which prevented him from surrendering himself to faith even when his overtaxed, tortured being longed to yield? understood well enough that it was his reason alone which protested, and the time had come when he would gladly have killed that voracious reason, which was devouring his life and preventing him from enjoying the happiness allowed to the ignorant and the simple. Perhaps, had he beheld a miracle, he might have acquired enough strength of will to believe. For instance, would he not have bowed himself down, vanquished at last if Marie had suddenly risen up and walked before him. This scene which he conjured up of Marie saved, Marie cured, affected him so deeply that he stopped short, his trembling arms uplifted towards the star-spangled vault of heaven. What a lovely night it wasl—so deep and ruysterious, so airy and fragrant; and what joy rained it was a concluded in which the Ahnighty received the poor one of the earth.

On entering, Pierre felt himself to be in some common hall trod by the footsteps of an ever-changing crowd, But the brilliant trod by the footsteps of an ever-changing crowd. But the brilliant of the steps; whilst the officiating minister galloped through the Latin phrases, hastily punctuating them with the prescribed signs evening, was the sight of all the altars desicred by rows of priests patiently awaiting their turn in the dim light at the foot find an altar unoccupied. What particularly struck Pierre that their duties, having to wait for hours together before they could abundance of priests, that many had extreme difficulty in fulfilling thousand masses were celebrated daily. And so great was the where there were altogether some fifty altars, more than two twelve hours at the Bosary alone. Taking the whole of Lourdes, Nearly four hundred were said during these not cease till noon. These masses began at midnight and did count the edilice. celebration of the masses at each of the lifteen altars ranged splendont of candles, chants, golden vestinents, und swinging, steaming censers; but of all this glorious display there now remained only the regulation number of tapers, necessary for the celebrated at midnight with extraordinary point, amidst all the gloon which filled the building. A solemn high mass had been ing at every after simply gleamed like stars amidst the uncertain trod by the footsteps of an ever-changing crowd. But the brilliant similarly no longer streamed on the pallid walls, the tapers burn-even doxing on the altar steps in heaps, quite overpowered, relying on the beadle to come and rouse them.

For a moment Pierre walked about undecided. Was he going to wait like the others! However, the scene determined him against doing so. At every altar, at every mass, a crowd of pilgrins was gathered, communicating in all haste with a sort of pilgrins fervour. Each pyx was filled and emptied incessantly, the priest's hands grew tired in thus distributing the bread of life; and Pierre's surprise increased at the sight. Never before had he beheld a corner of this earth so watered by the divine blood, whence faith a corner of this earth so watered by the divine blood, whence faith took wing in such a flight of souls. It was like a return to the heroic took wing in such a flight of souls. It was like a return to the heroic of the cross. And the weariness of all the waiting ones was so great, that most of them were seated on the flagstones, some

a corner of this earth so watered by the divine blood, whence faith took wing in such a flight of souls. It was like a return to the beroic days of the Church, when all nations prostrated themselves beneath the same blast of credulity in their terrified ignorance which led them to place their hope of eternal happiness in an Almighty God. It could fancy himself carried back some eight or nine centuries, to the time of great public piety, when people believed in the orbot time of great public piety, when people believed in the greatly not the crowd of the world; and this he could fancy the more readily as the crowd of the world; and this he whole host that had attended high mass, was still seated on the benches, as much at attended high mass, was still seated on the benches, as much at attended high mass, was still seated on the benches, as much at attended high mass, was at home. Many had no place of refuge as in God's house as at home, the asylmn where consolvion awaited then both by day and by night? Those who I was armed a manited them both by day and by night? Those who I was distribute the holy vestments and the clothes? It puzzled him, and entaged his thoughts with about persistence.

tt "I

melted away amidst her ardent prayer. hands and bowed head, but so indistinct that she seemed to have unconcious women was Madanie Mine, still kneeling, with clasped breathing of this pure slumber, upon which the Blessed Virgin, all while the voice of the invisible waters seemed to be merely the sleep reigned supreme over the dim, far-spreading countryside; aspect to the Grotto. All faded away amidst a delicious lassitude, sing had increased the gloom, and imparted a remote visionary ned in a divine tornor. It seemed as though the night in progressthere, dark, indistinct forms, kneeling in slumberous cestasy, wrapthe Crotto were emptying, and only some twenty persons remained of Marie. Three o'clock was about to strike, the benches belore returned thitlier unconsciously, attracted no doubt by thoughts before him, illumining the darkness with its everlasting brasier, which purnt with a flame of inextinguishable love. He had suddenly, sinilar to a miraculous apparition, the Grotto blazed of the Gave, which his accustonicd cars no longer heard. lifeless, not a light was gleaming. There only remained the growl Again he wandered through the night, a night which seemed to him utterly void, darker and stiller than before. The town was At length, to his surprise, he once more found himself outside, and engaged his thoughts with absurd persistency.

Pierre, however, had immediately gone up to Marie. He was shivering, and fancied that she must be chilled by the early morning air. "I beseed you, Marie, cover yourself up," said he. "Do you want to suffer still more?" And thereupon he drew up the shawl which had shipped off her, and endeavoured to fasten it about her neek. "You are cold, Marie," he added; "your hands are like ice."

She did not answer, she was still in the same attitude as when he had left her a couple of hours previously. With her elbows steing on the edges of her box, she kept herself raised, her soul still lifted towards the Blessed Virgin and her face transfigured, beaming with a celestial joy. Her hips moved, though no sound came from them. Perhaps she was still carrying on some nysterious conversation in the world of enchantments, dreaming wide awake, as she had been doing ever since he had placed her there. He spoke to her ugain, but still she answered not. At last, however, of her own accord, she numinum ted in a far-away voice: "Ohl am so happy, Pierrel I have seen her; I prayed to her for you, and she smiled at me, slightly nodding her head to let me know and she smiled at me, slightly nodding her head to let me know that she heard me and would grant my prayers. And though she did not speak to me, Pierre, I understood what she wished me to did not speak to me, Pierre, I understood what she wished me to brow. Tis to-day, at four o'clock in the afternoon, when Blessed Sacrament passes by, that I shall be cured?"

He listened to her in deep agitation. Had she been sle with her eyes wide open? Was it in a dream that she had seen the marble figure of the Blessed Virgin bend its head and smile? A great tremor passed through him at the thought that this pure child had prayed for him. And he walked up to the railing, and dropped upon his knees, stammering: "O Mariel O Mariel" without knowing whether this heart-cry were intended for the Virgin or for the beloved friend of his childhood. And he remained there, utterly overwhelmed, waiting for grace to come to him.

Endless minutes went by. This was indeed the superhuman effort, the waiting for the miracle which he had come to seek for himself, the sudden revelation, the thunderelap which was to sweep away his unbelief and restore him, rejuvenated and triumphant, to the faith of the simpleminded. He surrendered himself, he wished that some mighty power might ravage his being and transform it. But, even as before whilst saying his mass, he heard naught within him but an endless silence, felt nothing but a boundless vacuum. There was no divine intervention, his despairing heart almost seemed to cease beating. And although he strove to pray, to fix his mind wholly upon that powerful Virgin, so compassionate to poor humanity, his thoughts none the less wandered, won back by the outside world, and again turning to puerile trifles. Within the Grotto, on the other side of the railing, he had once more caught sight of Baron Suire, still asleep, still continuing his pleasant nap with his hands elasped in front of him. Other things also attracted his attention: the flowers depo-sited at the feet of the Virgin, the letters east there as though into a heavenly letter-box, the delicate lace-like work of wax which remained erect round the flames of the larger tapers, looking like some rich silver ornamentation. Then, without any apparent reason, his thoughts flew away to the days of his childhood, and his brother Guillaume's face rose before him with extreme distinctness. He had not seen him since their mother's death. He merely knew that he led a very seeluded life, occupying himself with scientific matters, in a little house in which he had buried himself with a mistress and two big dogs; and he would have known nothing more about him, but for having recently read his name in a newspaper in connection with some revolutionary attempt. It was stated that he was passionately devoting himself to the study of explosives, and in constant intercourse with the leaders of the most advanced parties. Why, however, should Guillaume appear to him in this wise, in this eestatic spot, amidst the mystical light of the tapers, appear to him, moreover, such as he had formerly known him, so good, affectionate, and brotherly, overflowing with charity for every affliction! The thought haunted him for a moment and filled him with painful regret for that brotherliness now dead and gone. Then, with hardly a moment's pause, his mind reverted to himself, and he realised that he might stubbornly remain there for house without remaining fait.

However,

pass by, And at this thought his anguish at once ceased, he rethat very day, at four o'clock in the afternoon, when, according to what the girl had told him, the Blessed Sacrament would delay which he allowed himself, an appointment with faith for of curing Marie, he would at last believe. It was like a final decling that if the Blessed Virgin should perform the great miracle theress, he felt a sort of tremor pass through him, a final hope, a mained kneeling, worn out with fatigue and overcome by invinci-

was still projected into the night, its reflection stretching to the The hours passed by, the resplendent illumination of the Crotto ble drowsiness.

remember having witnessed. There were searcely ten persons left before the Grotto, though imong them he again recognised he no longer beheld Buron Suire, whose departure he did not swept along the roads. Perhaps he also had been sleeping, for regions, was rapidly rising from the south. The thunder could already be heard rumbling in the distance, whilst gusts of wind He perceived that one of those storms, so sudden in mountainous it was the day breaking, beneath a leaden sky overeast with clouds. there. However, Pierre noticed it grow paler and paler, which surprised him, and he roused himself, feeling thoroughly chilled; neighbouring hill-sides and whitening the walls of the convents not remain there any longer, unless she wished to get wet throngle. recling anxious, Pierre went up to Marie to tell her she must to the convent of the Blue Sisters. she rose up, and vanished at a turn of the narrow path leading when she noticed that it was daylight and that she could be seen,

Madame Maze with her face hidden in her hands.

"I will take you back to the Hospital, said he.

She refused and then entreated: "No, nol I am waiting for mass,
I promised to communicate here. Dan't trouble about me, return well that covered vehicles are sent here for the sick whenever it to the hotel at once and go to bed, I implore you. You know very full, there came the priest, wearing a chasuble, and accompanied And now, just as some large drops of rain were beginning to amidst the glory of the rising sun, after a long night of ecstasy. and it was a divine joy for the pilgrims to be able to communicate, should be mentioned, was said at the Crotto early every morning, kept on repeating that he did not wish to go to bed. A mass it And she persisted in refusing to leave, whilst on his side he thou guigurdhevo off yd bereifeld od thig off that or gui Pierre, after pushing Marie's little conveyance close to the rula large white silk unibrella, embroidered with gold, over him. by two acolytes, one of whom, in order to protect the chalics, held had just seen her receive the sacrament arith ardem fercover-then under which the few other worshippers had also sought refuges his attention was attracted by a pitiful spectacle which quite wrung his heart.

".snins

Beneath a dense, heavy deluge of rain, he caught sight of Madame Vincent, still with that precious, woeful burden, her little Rosc, whom with outstretched arms she was offering to the Blessed Virgin. Unable to stay any longer at the shelter-house owing to the complaints caused by the child's constant moaning, she had carried her off into the night, and during two hours had roamed about in the darkness, lost, distracted, bearing this poor flesh of her flesh, which she pressed to her bosom unable to give it any relief. She knew not what road she had taken, bencath what trees she had strayed, so absorbed had she been in her revolt against the unjust sufferings which had so sorely stricken this poor little being, so feeble and so pure, and as yet quite incapable of sin. Was it not abominable that the grip of disease should for wecks have been incessantly torturing her child, whose cry she knew not how to quiet? She carried her about, rocking her in her arms as she went wildly along the paths, obstinately hoping that she would at last get her to sleep, and so hush that wail which was rending her heart. And, suddenly, utterly worn-out, sharing each of her daughter's death-pangs, she found herself opposite the Grotto, at the fect of the miracle-working Virgin, she who forgave and who healed.

"O Virgin, Mother most admirable, heal her! O Virgin Mother of Divine Grace, heal her!"

She had fallen on her knees, and with quivering, outstretched arms was still offering her expiring daughter, in a paroxysm of hope and desire which seemed to raise her from the ground. And the rain, which she never noticed, beat down behind her with the fury of an escaped torrent, whilst violent claps of thunder shook the mountains. For one moment she thought her prayer was granted, for Rose had slightly quivered as though visited by the archangel, her face becoming quite white, her eyes and mouth opening wide; and with one last little gasp she ceased her cry.
"O Virgin, Mother of Our Redeemer, heal herl O Virgin, All-powerful Mother, heal herl"

But the poor woman felt her child become even lighter in her extended arms. And now she became afraid at no longer hearing her moan, at seeing her so white, with staring eyes and open mouth, without a sign of life. How was it that she did not smile if she were cured? Suddenly a loud, heart-rending cry rang out, the cry of the mother, surpassing even the din of the thunder in the storm, whose violence was increasing. Her child was dead. And she rose up erect, turned her back on that deaf Virgin who let little children die, and started off like a madwoman beneath the lashing downpour, going straight before her without knowing whither, and still and ever carrying and nursing that poor little body which she had held in her arms during so many days and nights. A thunderbolt fell, shivering one of the neighbouring trees, as though with the stroke of a giant axe, amidst a great crash of twisted and broken branches.

Pierre had rushed after Madame Vincent, eager to guide and help her. But he was unable to follow her, for he at once lost sight of her behind the blurring curtain of rain. When he returned, the mass was drawing to an end, and as soon as the rain fell less violently, the officiating priest went off under the white silk unbrella embroidered with gold. Meantime a kind of omnibus awaited the few patients to take them back to the Hospital.

be all-powerful and heal every one of them, was not that the desire not that other? Where was the justice, where the compassion? To would never have had the courage to make. Why this one, and terrible power in all truth, a formidable selection, which he Pierre, had already asked himself the day before which ones he would have chosen had he possessed the power of saving ten. A intracles which Doctor Bonamy had proved by statistics. healing only ten out of a hundred sufferers-that ten per cent of Mother as she was, he wondered how her heart could decide upon He was amazed that she could make a choice, of her child. What could be the reasons which influenced the motiver, wandering along the muddy paths with the dead body not banish from his mind the thought of that broken-hearted Little Hose's death had increased his fever; he could betore. excitement in which he had been plunged ever since the day in spite of his weariness he dreaded sleep in the state of nervous self on the bench near the spring. He would not go to bed, for obstinate fine drizzle, Pierre re-entered the Grotto and seated him-On being left amidst the rain, which had now become an Do not come for me before three o'clock this afternoon." "Ohl how happy I ami" she Marie pressed Pierre's hands.

ance with laws which mankind knew nothing ob,

The rain was at last leaving off, and Pierre had been there a couple of hours when he telt that his feet were damp. He looked down, and was greatly surprised, for the spring was overflowing through the gratings. The soil of the Crotto was already covered; whilst outside a sheet of water was flowing under the benefies, as the parapet against the Gave. The late storms had swollen the waters in the neighbourhood. Pierre thereupon reflected that the waters in the neighbourhood. Pierre thereupon reflected that the waters in the neighbourhood, Pierre thereupon reflected that have that governed other springs, for it certainly communicated
have that governed other springs, for it certainly communicated with some natural reservoirs, wherein the rain penetrated and accumulated. And then, to keep his ankles dry, he left the place.

which rose from each heart? And the Virgin seemed to him to be eracl, hadly informed as harsh and indifferent as even unpossible nature, distributing life and death at random, or in accord-

THE TWO VICTIMS

PIERRE walked along thirsting for fresh air, his head so heavy that he took off his hat to relieve his burning brow. Despite all the fatigue of that terrible night of vigil, he did not think of sleeping. He was kept creet by that rebellion of his whole being which he could not quiet. Eight o'clock was striking, and he walked at random under the glorious morning sun, now shining forth in a spotless sky, which the storm seemed to have cleansed of all the Sunday dust.

All at once, however, he raised his head, anxious to know where he was; and he was quite astonished, for he found that he had already covered a deal of ground, and was now below the station, near the municipal hospital. He was hesitating at a point where the road forked, not knowing which direction to take, when a

"The load to knowing which direction to take, when a friendly, hand was laid on his shoulder, and a voice inquired: "Where are you going at this early hour?"

It was Doctor Chassaigne who addressed him, drawing up his lofty figure, clad in black from head to foot. "Have you lost yourself?" he added; "do you want to know the way?"

"No whether the property of the complete distributed." To report the class of the property of the

"No, thanks, no," replied Pierre, somewhat disturbed. "I spent the night at the Grotto with that young patient to whom I am so much attached, and my heart was so upset that I have been walking about in the hope it would do me good, before returning to the hotel to take a little sleep."

The doctor continued looking at him, clearly detecting the frightful struggle which was raging within him, the despair which he felt at being unable to sink asleep in faith, the suffering which the futility of all his efforts brought him. "Ah, my poor child!" murmured M. Chassaigne; and, in a fatherly way, he added: Well, since you are walking, suppose we take a walk together? I was just going down yonder, to the bank of the Gave. Come along, and on our way back you will see what a lovely view we shall have."

For his part, the doctor took a walk of a couple of hours' duration cach morning, ever alone, seeking, as it were, to tire and exhaust his grief. First of all, as soon as he had risen, he repaired to the cemetery, and knelt on the tomb of his wife and daughter, which at all seasons he decked with flowers. And afterwards he would roam along the roads, with tearful eyes, never returning home until fatigue compelled him.

With a wave of the hand, Pierre accepted his proposal, and

and the Basilica. And, all at once, the Grotto appeared, with the new town; and you could see the gardens, the inclined ways, followed the Gave on its right bank, on the other side of the so warm in the sunlight on that lovely morning. The road now pale, and tears still blurred his eyes. And yet it was so pleasant, bowed; his face, round which his white hair streamed, was very bleed yet more copiously. He walked along with his head its though his chat with his dear lost ones had made his heart They remained for a long time without speaking; the doctor seemed more overcome than was his wont that morning; it was in perfect silence they went, side by side, down the sloping road.

if was only the illusion that he would live once more in paradise, where loving souls meet again, that prolonged his life on earth. list, so overwhelmed by grief that he was now a believer, longing for the one delight of meeting his dear ones in another life. on finding this man of seience, this whilom atheist and materianishment which had come over him a couple of days previously when, in his turn, he had perceived the Crotto, he glanced in suprise at his old friend, and once more relapsed into the astooverlisting flare of its tapers, now paling in the broad light.

Doctor Chassaigne, who had turned his head, made the sign of the cross, which Pierre did not at first understand. And those clear waters rolling over the pebbles, between banks shaded Still walking beside the Gave, leaving the town farther and farther behind them, they were hilled as it were by the noise of Sillied ni ogudor u bind of robro also wait mittl he had grown old and endured equal sufferings in This thought mercased the young priest's discomfort. Must be

by trees. And they still remained silent, walking on with an equal step, each, on his own side absorbed in his sorrows.

"And Bernadette," Pierre suddenly inquired. "did you know.

sun ous maintaine enough to pay Bernadette a gist. She was bun later, however, sometime about 1864, I passed through Lourdes, escongnisullad mort grirollus fig a pos of Line or six hears notions, so that I had no idea of returning to my native mountains time of the apparitions, I was thirty years of age. I was in Paris, still young in my profession, and opposed to all supernatural monient, and then began chatting: "In 1858, von know, at the "I saw her once-aftervards." He relaysed into silence for a on birs "soy soy" The doctor raised his head. "Bernadette?" بادرني humble, lovable girl, on the day when he should be convinced to the big indeed to divine love-and forgive that who could tell if grace might not come to him from that Pierre remembered that one of the reasons of his journey had being brandette. The desire to complete his inquiry respecting Bernadette. the astill at the asyling with the Sisters of Nevers,

THE TWO VICTIMS

Pierre walked along thirsting for fresh air, his head so heavy that he took off his hat to relieve his burning brow. Despite all the fatigue of that terrible night of vigil, he did not think of sleeping He was kept creet by that rebellion of his whole being which he could not quiet. Eight o'clock was striking, and he walked at random under the glorious morning sun, now shining forth in a spotless sky, which the storm seemed to have cleansed o all the Sunday dust.

All at once, however, he raised his head, anxious to know when he was; and he was quite astonished, for he found that he had already covered a deal of ground, and was now below the station near the municipal hospital. He was hesitating at a point where the road forked, not knowing which direction to take, when friendly hand was laid on his shoulder, and a voice inquired "Where are you going at this early hour?"

'It was Doetor Chassaigne who addressed him, drawing up hi lofty figure, clad in black from head to foot. "Have you los yourself?" he added; "do you want to know the way?"

"No, thanks, no," replied Pierre, somewhat disturbed. "I spen the night at the Grotto with that young patient to whom I an so much attached, and my heart was so upset that I have been walking about in the hope it would do me good, before returning to the hotel to take a little sleep."

The doctor continued looking at him, clearly detecting the frightful struggle which was raging within him, the despair which he felt at being unable to sink asleep in faith, the suffering which the futility of all his efforts brought him. "Ah, my poor child!" murmured M. Chassaigne; and, in a fatherly way, he added

"Well, since you are walking, suppose we take a walk together I was just going down yonder, to the bank of the Gave. Como along, and on our way back you will see what a lovely view

For his part, the doctor took a walk of a couple of hours' duration each morning, ever alone, seeking, as it were, to tire and exhaust his grief. First of all, as soon as he had risen, he repaired to the cemetery, and knelt on the tomb of his wife and daughter, which at all seasons he deeked with flowers. And afterwards he would roam along the roads, with tearful eyes never returning home until fatigue compelled him.

With a wave of the hand, Pierre accepted his proposal, and

and the Basilica. And, all at once, the Grotto appeared, with the new towns and you could see the gardens, the inclined ways, followed the Gave on its right bank, on the other side of the pale, and tenrs still blurred his eyes. And yet it was so pleasant, so warm in the sunlight on that lovely morning. The road now howed; his face, round which his white hair streamed, was very He walked along with his head bleed yet more copiously. as though his chat with his dear lost ones had made his heart They remained for a long time without speaking; the doctor seemed more overcome than was his wont that morning; it was in perfect silence they went, side by side, down the sloping road.

order to find a refuge in faith? also wait muil he had grown old and endared equal sufferings in This thought increased the young priest's disconnent, This he where loving souls meet again, that prolonged his life on earth. it was only the illusion that he would live once more in paradise, His heart had swept his reason away; old and lonely as he was, list, so overwhelmed by grief that he was now a believer, longing for the one delight of meeting his dear ones in another life. on finding this man of science, this whilom atheist and materianishment which had come over him a couple of days previously when, in his turn, he had perceived the Grotto, he glanced in surprise at his old friend, and once more relapsed into the astoeverlasting flare of its tapers, now paling in the broad light.

Doetor Chassaigne, who had turned his head, made the sign of the cross, which Pierre did not at first understand. And by trees. And they still remained silent, walking on with an equal step, each, on his own side absorbed in his sorrows. "And Bernadette," Pierre suddenly inquired; "did you know." those clear waters rolling over the pebbles, between banks shaded Still walking beside the Give, leaving the town farther and farther by the noise of

then still at the asylum with the Sisters of Nevers." and was inquisitive enough to pay Bernadette a visit. later, however, sometime about 1664, I passed through Lourdes. to see a girl suffering from hallacinations. Five or six years notions, so that I had no idea of returning to my native mountains time of the apparitions, I was thirty years of age. I was in Paris, still young in my profession, and opposed to all supernatural The doctor raised his head. "Bernadette? Yes, yes," said he: "I saw her once-afterwards," He relapsed into silence for a monient, and then began chatting: "In 1858, you know, at the port humble, lovable girl, on the day when he should be convinced that alle had indeed fulfilled a mission of divine love and forgiveness? And who could tell if grace might not come to him from that Pierre remembered that one of the reasons of his journey had

THE TWO VICTIMS

PIERRE walked along thirsting for fresh air, his head so heavy that he took off his hat to relieve his burning brow. Despite all the fatigue of that terrible night of vigil, he did not think of sleeping. He was kept ercet by that rebellion of his whole being which he could not quiet. Eight o'clock was striking, and he walked at random under the glorious morning sun, now shining forth in a spotless sky, which the storm seemed to have cleansed of all the Sunday dust.

All at once, however, he raised his head, anxious to know where he was; and he was quite astonished, for he found that he had already covered a deal of ground, and was now below the station, near the municipal hospital. He was hesitating at a point where the road forked, not knowing which direction to take, when a friendly, hand was laid on his shoulder, and a voice inquired: "Where are you going at this early hour?"

It was Doctor Chassaigne who addressed him, drawing up his lofty figure, clad in black from head to foot. "Have you lost

yourself?" he added; "do you want to know the way?"

"No, thanks, no," replied Pierre, somewhat disturbed. "I spent the night at the Grotto with that young patient to whom I am so much attached, and my heart was so upset that I have been walking about in the hope it would do me good, before returning to the hotel to take a little sleep.

The doctor continued looking at him, clearly detecting the frightful struggle which was raging within him, the despair which he telt at being unable to sink asleep in faith, the suffering which the futility of all his efforts brought him. "Ah, my poor child!" murmured M. Chassaigne; and, in a fatherly way, he added: "Well, since you are walking, suppose we take a walk together? I was just going down yonder, to the bank of the Gave. Come along, and on our way back you will see what a lovely view we shall have."

For his part, the doctor took a walk of a couple of hours' duration each morning, ever alone, seeking, as it were, to tire and exhaust his grief. First of all, as soon as he had risen, he repaired to the cemetery, and knelt on the tomb of his wife and daughter, which at all seasons he decked with flowers. And afterwards he would roam along the roads, with tearful eyes, never returning home until fatigue compelled him.

With a wave of the hand, Pierre necepted his proposal, and humble, lovable girl, on the day when he should be convinced that she had indeed fulfilled a mission of divine love and forgiveness? And who could tell if grace might not come to him from that proping grinders volument in addition to spice by month Pierre remembered that one of the reasons of his journey had and was inquisitive enough to pay Bernadette a visit. then still at the asylum with the Sisters of Nevers. SUAV OUS later, however, sometime about 1864, I passed through Lourdes, to see a girl suffering from hallucinations. Five or six years still young in my profession, and opposed to all supernatural motions, so that I had no idea of returning to my native mountains time of the apparitions, I was thirty years of age. I was in Paris, moment, and then began chatting: "In 1858, you know, at the The doctor raised his head. "Bernadette? Yes, yes, said he, is long of the relapsed into silence for a large of the relapsed into silence for a her?"

by trees. And they still remained silent, walking on with an equal step, each, on his own side absorbed in his sorrows. "And Bernadette," Pierre suddenly inquired; "did yon know." those clear waters rolling over the pebbles, between banks slinded

Still walking beside the Gave, leaving the town farther and farther and order to find a refuge in faith? also wait intil he had grown old and endured equal sufferings in This thought increased the young priest's discomfort. This he where loving souls meet again, that prolonged his life on earth. tives only the illusion that he would live once more in paradise, list, so overwhelmed by grief that he was now a believer, longing for the one delight of meeting his dear ones in another life. on finding this man of science, this whilom atheist and materiamisliment which had come over him a couple of days previously surprise at his old friend, and once more relapsed into the astowhen in his turn, he had perceived the Grotto, he glanced in Doctor Chassaigne, who had turned his head, made the sign everlasting flare of its tapers, now paling in the broad light. and the Basilica. And, all at once, the Grotto appeared, with the new town; and you could see the gardens, the inclined ways, followed the Gave on its right bank, on the other side of the pole, and tears still blurred his eyes. And yet it was so pleasant, so warm in the sunlight on that lovely morning. The road now bowed; his face, round which his white hair streamed, was very He walked along with his head pleed yet more copiously. as though his chat with his dear lost ones had made his heart They remained for a long time without speaking; the doctor seemed more overcome than was his wont that morning; it was in perfect silence they went, side by side, down the sloping road.

THE TWO VICTIMS

PIERRE walked along thirsting for fresh air, his head so heavy that ie took off his hat to relieve his burning brow. Despite all the atigue of that terrible night of vigil, he did not think of sleeping. He was kept erect by that rebellion of his whole being which ic could not quiet. Eight o'clock was striking, and he walked it random under the glorious morning sun, now shining forth in a spotless sky, which the storm seemed to have cleansed of ill the Sunday dust.

All at once, however, he raised his head, anxious to know where he was; and he was quite astouished, for he found that he had already covered a deal of ground, and was now below the station, near the municipal hospital. He was hesitating at a point where the road forked, not knowing which direction to take, when a friendly, hand was laid on his shoulder, and a voice inquired:

"Where are you going at this early hour?"

It was Doctor Chassaigne who addressed him, drawing up his lofty figure, clad in black from head to foot. "Have you lost yourself?" he added; "do you want to know the way?"

"No, thanks, no," replied Pierre, somewhat disturbed. "I spent the night at the Grotto with that young patient to whom I am so much attached, and my heart was so upset that I have been walking about in the hope it would do me good, before returning to the hotel to take a little sleep.

The doctor continued looking at him, clearly detecting the frightful struggle which was raging within him, the despair which he felt at being unable to sink asleep in faith, the suffering which the futility of all his efforts brought him. "Ah, my poor child!" murmired M. Chassaigne; and, in a fatherly way, he added: "Well, since you are walking, suppose we take a walk together? I was just going down yonder, to the bank of the Gave. Come along, and on our way back you will see what a lovely view we shall have."

. For his part, the doctor took a walk of a couple of hours' duration each morning, ever alone, seeking, as it were, to tire and exhaust his grief. First of all, as soon as he had risen, he repaired to the cemetery, and knelt on the tomb of his wife and daughter, which at all seasons he decked with flowers. And afterwards he would roam along the roads, with tearful eyes, never returning home until fatigue compelled him.

With a wave of the hand, Pierre accepted his proposal, and

and the Basiliea. And, all at onee, the Crotto appeared, with the everlasting flare of its tapers, now paling in the broad light. new town; and you could see the gardens, the inclined ways, so wann in the sunlight on that lovely morning. The road now followed the Gave on its right hank, on the other side of the pale, and tears still blurred his eyes. And yet it was so pleasant, boyved; his face, round which his white hair streamed, was very He walked along with his head bleed yet more copiously. They remained for a long time without speaking; the doctor seemed more overcome than was his wont that morning; it was as though his chaet with his dear lost ones had made his heart in perfect silence they went, side by side, down the sloping road.

also wait until he had grown old and endured equal sufferings in This thought increased the young priest's disconitort. Must be where loving souls meet again, that prolonged his life on earth. His heart had swept his reason away; old and lonely as he was, it was only the illusion that he would live onee more in paradise, list, so overwhelmed by grief that he was now a believer, longing for the one delight of meeting his dear ones in another life. nishment which had come over him a couple of days previously on finding this man of seience, this whilom atheist and materiasurprise at his old friend, and once more relapsed into the astoof the cross, which Pierre did not at first understand. And when, in his turn, he had perceived the Grotto, he glanced in Doctor Chassaigne, who had turned his head, made the sign those elear waters rolling over the pebbles, between banks shaded Still walking beside the Gave, leaving the town farther and farther behind them, they were lulled as it were by the noise of order to find a refuge in faith?

equal step, each, ou his own side absorbed in his sorrows.

Por? "And Bernadette," Pierre suddenly inquired; "did you know and was inquisitive enough to pay Bemadette a visit. later, however, sometime about 1864, I passed through Lourdes. Live of six years to see a girl suffering from hallucinations. time of the apparitions, I was thirty years of age. I was in Paris, still young in my profession, and opposed to all supernatural notions, so that I had no idea of returning to my native mountains "I saw her onee-afterwards." He relapsed into silence for a moment, and then began chatting: "In 1858, you know, at the The doctor raised his head, "Bernadette? Yes, yes," said he.

essengified for some principles of solution of the second principles of the second sec humble, lovable girl, on the day when he should be convinced that and who could tell if grace might not come to him from that been his desire to complete his inquiry respecting Bernadette. then still at the asylum with the Sisters of Nevers."
Pietre remembered that one of the reasons of his journey had For this consummation to ensue it would perhaps suffice that he should know her better and learn to feel that she was really the saint, the chosen one, as others believed her to have been.
"Tell me about her, I pray you," he said; "tell me all you know of her."

A faint smile curved the doctor's lips. He understood, and would have greatly liked to calm and comfort the young priest whose soul was so grievously tortured by doubt. "Oh! willingly, my poor child!" he answered. "I should be so happy to help you on the path to light. You do well to love Bernadettc-that may save you; for since all those old-time things I have deeply reflected on her case, and I declare to you that I never met a more charming creature, or one with a better heart."

Then, to the slow rhythm of their footsteps along the well-kept. sunlit road, in the delightful freshness of morning, the doctor began to relate his visit to Bernadette in 1864. She had then just attained her twentieth birthday, the apparitions had taken place six years previously, and she had astonished him by her candid and sensible air, her perfect modesty. The Sisters of Nevers, who had taught her to read, kept her with them at the asylum in order to shield her from public inquisitiveness. She found an occupation there, helping them in sundry petty duties; but she was very often taken ill, and would spend weeks at a time in her bed. The doctor had been particularly struck by her beautiful eyes, pure, candid, and frank like those of a child. The rest of her face, said he, had become somewhat spoilt; her complexion was losing its clearness, her features had grown less delicate, and her general appearance was that of an ordinary servant-girl, short, puny, and unobtrusive. Her piety was still keen, but she had not seemed to him to be the ecstatical, excitable creature that many might have supposed; indeed, she appeared to have a rather positive mind which did not indulge in flights of fancy; and she invariably had some little piece of needlework, some knitting, some embroidery in her hand. In a word, she appeared to have entered the common path, and in nowise resembled the intensely passionate female worshippers of the Christ. She had no further visions, and never of her own accord spoke of the eighteen apparitions which had decided her life. To learn anything it was necessary to interrogate her, to address precise questions to her. These she would briefly answer, and then seek to change the conversation, as though she did not like to talk of such mysterious things. If, wishing to probe the matter further, you asked her the nature of the three secrets which the Virgin had confided to her, she would remain silent, simply averting her eyes. And it was impossible to make her contradict herself; the particulars she gave invariably agreed with her original narrative, and, indeed, she always seemed to repeat the same words, with the same inflections of the voice.

roanted the roads with bare feet, and still trembled at the idea of what might have become of her but for the help of the Blessed in danger, was it not because she herself renieinbered having wished it to be extremely large, so as to lodge all the little lambs along this very road. Poor little girls are received into it, and shielded from the perils of the highways. And if Bernadette took in the orphan asylum built by the Sisters of Nevers, farther ' in which she grew up, first Bartrès, and then the convent. Still, a doubt came to me when I heard of the tender interest which she in body. However, I think it quite possible, given her sluggish, poor-blooded temperament, not to speak of the innocent sphere remained as pure in mind as, most undoubtedly, she did remain me, I will confess to you that I have sometimes wondered if she And as, after all, the medical man is not quite dead within all, but it was only for children that she showed any lively affeceular human love for anybody. She was kind and gentle towards never known to have a single intimate female friend, any partithe world, and was only happy in her solitary corner, resumed: "Moreover, it is quite true that Bernadette shunned For a moment they became silent, and only the rhylimical sound of their steps was heard along the road. Then the doctor

so many contradictory cases." elsewhere. However, that is but one eireumstance, and there are that she was suffering from a serious complaint of the digestive organs, but who nevertheless began to eat when she was taken herself to waste away with hunger at home, because she imagined famous medical-school example of the young girl who allowed himself but little on his science, and no longer claims to be able to explain anything. However, I do of course know of that know yery well that I am now only a poor old man, who prides The doctor's faint smile returned to his lips, and vaguely waving his arm, he replied: "Ahl my child, you ask me too muchl You naturally enough, obstinately clung to it. remain in the same environment in which the phenomenon oc-curred? Cloistered, living alone with her fixed idea, Bernadette, asked. "Has it not been proved, is it not admitted nowadays, that when certain degenerate creatures with childish minds fall into an hallucination, a fancy of some kind or other, they are often unable to free themselves from it, especially when they are admit, doctor, the possibility of some disorder of the will?" he Pierre boldly ventured to discuss this point. But won't you syllable in her story. It was disconcerting. Still, I am prepared to swear that she was altogether incapable of falsehood. unued Doctor Chassaigne, "and there was not the variation of a "I had her in hand during the whole of one afternoon," con-

in her asylum at Lourdes. This had proved a source of eonsiderable fatigue to her. Not a day went by without a stream of visitors appearing before her. They came from all parts of France, some even from abroad; and it soon became necessary to refuse the applications of those who were actuated by mere inquisitiveness, and to grant admittance only to the genuine believers, the members of the elergy, and the people of mark on whom the doors could not well have been shut. A Sister was always present to protect her against the excessive indiscretion of some of her visitors, for questions literally rained upon her, and she often grew faint through having to repeat her story so many times. Ladies of high position fell on their knees, kissed her gown, and would have liked to earry a piece of it away as a relie. She also had to defend her chaplet, which in their excitement they all begged her to sell to them for a fabulous amount. One day a certain marchioness endeavoured to secure it by giving her another one which she had brought with her-a chaplet with a golden cross and beads of real pearls. Many hoped that she would consent to work a miracle in their presence; children were brought to her in order that she might lay her hands upon them; she was also consulted in cases of illness, and attempts were made to purchase her influence with the Virgin. Large sums were offered to her. At the slightest sign, the slightest expression of a desire to be a queen, decked with jewels and erowned with gold, she would have been overwhelmed with regal presents. And while the humble remained on their knees on her threshold, the great ones of the earth pressed round her, and would have counted it a glory to act as her escort. It was even related that one among them, the handsomest and wealthiest of princes, came one clear sunny April day to ask her hand in marriage!

"But what always struck and displeased ine," said Pierre, "was her departure from Lourdes when she was two-and-twenty, her sudden disappearance and sequestration in the convent of Saint Gildard at Nevers, whence she never emerged. Didn't that give a semblance of truth to those spurious rumours of insanity which were circulated? Didn't it help people to suppose that she was being shut up, whisked away for fear of some indiscretion on her part, some naïve remark or other which might have revealed the secret of a prolonged fraud? Indeed, to speak plainly, I will confess to you that for my own part I still believe that she was spirited away."

Doetor Chassaigne gently shook his head. "No, no," said he, "there was no story prepared in advance in this affair, no big melodrama secretly staged and afterwards performed by more or less unconscious actors. The developments came of themselves, by the sole force of circumstances; and they were always very intricate, very difficult to analyse. Moreover, it is certain that it was Bernadette herself who wished to leave Lourdes.

"autor.) to dynamist off orneati dan guest scarcely knowing how or why; and she could really be of no further utility. Others were about in conduct matters to an work was accomplished; she had initiated this great movement lonely spot so as to prepare herself to make a good death. she should have wished to disappear and cloister herself in some to remain in the background, one can very well understand that such pride as she possessed, such natural simplicity, such a desire herself or for her family, which remained in poverty. And with would ling it upon the floor. She never accepted anything for disinterestedness, that when money was handed to her, even with the pious intent of having a mass said or a taper burnt, she she might live in peace, and, so fleree was she at times in her that noisy worship. All that she desired was a dim nook where Those incessant visits wearied her, she felt ill at ease antidst all millions of money were raining down on Lourdes from the whole you speak of, who thenceforth became the real masters, winlst said Pierre; 'still, what a relief it must have been for the people "Let us admit, then, that she went off of her own accord," or more medest child.

"bliow

Wever, indeed, was there a more candidate more candidate more modest child. doing her a grave injury, for she was as incapable of pride tall into the sin of pride, by growing vain of the saintly fame with which the whole of Christendom re-echoed. And this was prises of the world, as though it were feared that she might in saying that it was a question of servening her from the enterwhich induced Monseigneur Laurence, the Bishop of Tarbes, to hasten her departure. The only mistake that was made was were a simple legend. Such, indeed, must have heen the reasons Bemadette should withdraw into the background, became us it to remain alone, resplendent in its glory, it was advisable that made her, so to say, a conspectior of the Grotto. For the Crotto she was none the less a power, and attracted the multitude, which scarcely ornamental. Besides, however small the room winen she took up at Lourdes, however obedient she showed herself, Besides, however small the room which ber that, with her extreme timidity and frequent illnesses, she was ended by deconing somewhat of an incumhrance. It was not that any annoying revelations were feared from her; but rememthat she was in some degree urged into the course she took. "Oh, certainly; I don't pretend that any attempt was made to detain her herel exclaimed the doctor. "Frankly, I even believe the more have I learned to love her. But you must not think, Pietre, that I am completely brutified by belief, if I feel a need admondedge the existence of an unseen power, if I feel a need he became calm again, and a pale smile returned to his lips.

"Tis true, said he, "I love her; the more I have thought of her, the shore in the part that the part the part that the part that the part that the part that the part the part that the part that the part that the part that the part the part that the part that the part that the part that the part the part that the part the part that the part the part that the The doctor was growing impassioned, excited. But all at once of believing in another, better, and more just life, I nevertheless know right well that there are men remaining in this world of ours; and at times, even when they were the cowl or the cassock, the work they do is vile."

There came another interval of silence. Each was continuing his dream apart from the other. Then the doctor resumed: "I will tell you of a faney which has often haunted me. Suppose we admit that Bernadette was not the shy, simple child we knew her to be; let us endow her with a spirit of intrigue and domina-tion, transform her into a conqueress, a leader of nations, and try to picture what, in that case, would have happened. It is evident that the Grotto would be hers, the Basilica also. We should see her lording it at all the ceremonies, under a daïs, with a gold mitre on her head. She would distribute the miraeles: with a sovereign gesture her little hand would lead the multitudes to heaven. All the lustre and glory would come from her, she being the saint, the chosen one, the only one that had been privileged to see the Divinity face to face. And, indeed, nothing would seem more just, for she would triumph after toiling, enjoy the fruit of her labour in all glory. But you see, as it happens, she is defrauded, robbed. The marvellous harvests sown by her are reaped by others. During the twelve years which she lived at Saint Gildard, kneeling in the gloom, Lourdes was full of victors, priests in golden vestments chanting thanksgivings, and blessing churches and monuments erected at a cost of millions. She alone did not behold the triumph of the new faith, whose author she had been. You say that she dreamt it all. Well, at all events, what a beautiful dream it was, a dream which has stirred the whole world, and from which she, dear girl, never awakened!"

They halted and sat down for a moment on a rock beside the road, before returning to the town. In front of them the Gave, deep at this point of its course, was rolling blue waters tinged with dark moire-like reflections, whilst, farther on, rushing hurriedly over a bed of large stones, the stream became so much foam, a white froth, light like snow. Amidst the gold raining from the sun, a fresh breeze came down from the mountains.

Whilst listening to that story of how Bernadette had been exploited and suppressed, Pierre had simply found in it all a fresh motive for revolt; and, with his eyes fixed on the ground, he began to think of the injustice of nature, of that law which wills that the strong should devour the weak. Then, all at once raising his head, he inquired: "And did you also know Abbé Peyramale?"

The doctor's eyes brightened once more, and he eagerly replied: "Certainly I did! He was an upright, energetic man, a saint, an apostle. He and Bernadette were the great makers of Our Lady of Lourdes. Like her, he endured frightful sufferings, and, like her, he died from them. Those who do not know his story can know nothing, understand nothing, of the drama enacted here."

From that moment, then, Abbé Peyramale had but one thought, to excente the orders which the Virgin had commissioned Bernapassionate ardour and determination to succeed. great eause to which he might wholly devote himself with all his vocation, the vast field in which he might exercise his energy, tho crowds, who builds, and in this affairs he had really found his the Church seemed to be on the eve of another great triumph. Then, too, he had the nature of one who leads men, who stirs up sceptic when entire populations were falling on their knees and minister of religion, whatever his prudence, to set himself up as a The civil authorities were persecuting one of his flock; at this shepherd's heart avoke, and, in her defence, he gave full his shepherd's heart avoke, and, in her defence, he gave full this ardent passion for justice. Moreover, the charm which the child diffused had worked upon him; he felt her to be so candid, so truthful, that he began to place a blind faith in her and love her even as everybody else loved her. Moreover, when and love her even as everybody else loved her. Moreover, when and love her even as everybody else loved her. Moreover, when and love her even as everybody else loved her. Moreover, when and love her even as everybody else loved her. Moreover, when miracles abound in the pages of Holy Writ? It was not for a miracles abound in the pages of Holy Writ? It was not for a minister of religion, whatever his prudence, to set himself up as a minister of religion, whatever his prudence, to set himself up as a strain when he beheld Bernadette threatened with imprisonment. his love for the humble and the oppressed, which he could not reand when he was finally conquered, it was more particularly by proofs. It was only at a later stage, when the blast of faith became irresistible, upsetting the most rebellious minds and mastering the multitude, that he ended, in his turn, by bowing his head; to believe in Bernadette's stories, questioned her, and demanded ing the duties of his ministry in a broad, liberal spirit, he regarded the apparitions with distrust when he first heard of them, refused built for combat. An enemy of all pious exaggerations, discharghearted, though at times violent and domineering. He scemed A native of the region, tall, broad-shouldered, with a powerful leonine head, he was extremely intelligent, very honest and good-Thereupon he related that story at length. Abbe Peyramale was the parish priest of Lourdes at the time of the apparitions.

dette to transmit to him. He caused improvements to be earried out at the Crotto. A railing was placed in front of it; pipes were laid for the conveyance of the water from the source, and a variety of work was accomplished in order to clear the a variety of work was accomplished in order to clear the a chapel might be built; and he wished to have a church, quite a chapel might be built; and he wished to have a church, quite a triumplial basilica. He pictured everything on a grand scale, and, full of confidence in the enthusiastic help of Christendom, he worried the architects, requiring them to design real palaces worthy of the Queen of Heaven. As a matter of fact, offerings already abounded, gold poured from the most distant dioeeses, a already abounded, gold poured from the most distant dioeeses, a sinn of gold destined to increase and never end. Then came his fain of gold destined to increase and never end. Then came his happy years: he was to be met among the workmen at all hours, instilling activity into them like the jovial, good-natured fellow he was, constantly on the point of taking a pick or trowel in hand himself, such was his cagerness to behold the realisation of his dream. But days of trial were in store for him: he fell ill, and lay in danger of death on the fourth of April 1864, when the first procession started from his parish ehurch to the Grotto, a procession of sixty thousand pilgrims, which wound along the streets

On the day when Abbé Peyramale rose from his bed, saved, a first time, from death, he found himself despoiled. To second him in his heavy task Monseigneur Laurence, the Bishop, had already given him as assistant a former episeopal secretary, Father Senpé, whom he had appointed warden of the Missionaries of Garaison, a community founded by himself. Father Sempé was a sly, spare little man, to all appearance most disinterested and humble, but in reality consumed by all the thirst of ambition. At the outset he kept in his place, serving the parish priest of Lourdes like a faithful subordinate, attending to matters of all kinds in order to lighten the other's work, and aequiring information on every possible subject in his desire to render himself indispensable. He must soon have realised what a rich farm the Gratto was destined to become, and what a colossal revenue might be clerived from it, if only a little skill were exercised. And thenceforth he no longer stirred from the episcopal residence, but ended by acquiring great influence over the calm, practical Bishop, who was in great need of money for the charities of his diocese. And thus it was that during Abbé Peyramale's illness Father Sempé succeeded in effecting a separation between the parish of Lourdes and the domain of the Grotto, which last he was commissioned to manage at the head of a few Fathers of the Immaeulate Conception, over whom the Bishop placed him as Father Superior.

The struggle soon began, one of those covert, desperate, mortal struggles which are waged under the cloak of ecclesiastical discipline. There was a pretext for rupture all ready, a field of battle on which the longer purse would necessarily end by conquering. It was proposed to build a new parish church, larger and more worthy of Lourdes than the old one already in existence, which was admitted to have become too small since the faithful had been flocking into the town in larger and larger numbers. Moreover, it was an old idea of Abbé Peyramale, who desired to carry out the Virgin's orders with all possible precision. Speaking of the Grotto, she had said that people would go "thither in procession"; and the Abbé had always seen the pilgrims start in procession ; and the Abbe had always seen the phagmas start in procession from the town, whither they were expected to return in the same fashion, as indeed had been the practice on the first occasions of the phagmas and the practice of the phagmas and the phagmas and the phagmas and the phagmas and the phagmas are the phagmas and the phagmas and the phagmas are the pha sions after the apparitions. A central point, a rallying-spot, was therefore required, and the Abbe's dream was to erect a magnificent ehurch, a eathedral of gigantie proportions, which would accommodate a vast multitude. Builder as he was by temperature of the control ment, impassioned artisan working for the glory of Heaven, he its clanging belity in the sunlight. And it was also his own house that he wished to build, the edifice which would be his act of faith and adoration, the temple where he would be the pontiff, and triumph in company with the sweet memory of Bernadette, in full view of the spot of which both he and she had been so cruelly dispossessed. Asturally enough, bitterly as he felt that act of degree his revenge, his share of all the glory, besides being a task which would enable him to utilise both his militant activity and the fever that had been consuming him ever since he had ceased unjust lay the Crotte had been consumming him ever since he had ceased the fever that had been consuming him ever since he had ceased the fever that had been consumning him ever since he had ceased the fever that had been consumning him ever since he had ceased the fever that had been consumning him ever since he had ceased the fever that had been consumning him ever since he had ceased the fever that his Grotte him to utilise better that he had been consumning him ever since he had ceased the fever that had been consumning him ever since he had ceased the fever that had been consumning him ever since he had ceased the fever that had been consumning him ever since he had ceased the fever that he had been something the had been something th placed inside the Basilica. tor contributions to the building of the new parish church to be the management of the Grotto, and even allowed a collection-box the phinder; for he now pretended to devote himself entirely to competition, which would compet him to relinquish a share of it seemed, too, as though Pather Sempé, with his customary lumii-lity, had bowed to the inevitable and accepted this vexatious admitted that the enterprise was necessary and meritorious. And Bishop of Tarbes, for this prelate, after blessing the foundation-stone of the new church, had delivered an address in which he neur Jourdan, who had now succeeded Monseignue Laurence as He even fincied that he could rely apon the support of Monseigwithout any anxiety, overflowing with a careless bravery, and fully expecting that Heaven would not abandon him on the road. down from all parts, and so he launched into this big enterprise Abbe believed that offerings would assuredly continue raining promised supplies of funds should be regularly forthcoming. The who engaged to complete the church in three or four years if the should be roofed in. Abbe Peyramale had already accepted the plans of his architect—plans which, he had insisted, should be on a grand scale—and had also treated with a contractor of Chartres, which, unfortunately, was not to be paid until the new church thrust upon one side, espoused the cause of its priest. The municipal council voted a sum of one hundred thousand francs, money flow into the Basiliea, the old town, which felt itself At the prospect of seeing all the life and all the cuthusiasm At the outset of the new enterprise there was again a flash of going to the Crotto, by reason of his soreness of heart.

Then, however, the secret, rageful struggle began afresh. Abbé Peyramale, who was a wretched manager, exulted on seeing his new cluuch so rapidly take shape. The work was being carried on at a fast pace, and he troubled about nothing else, being still under the delusion that the Blessed Virgin would find whatever money might be needed. Thus he was quite stupefied when he at last perceived that the offerings were falling off, that the money at last perceived that the offerings were falling off, that the money of the faithful no longer reached him, as though, indeed, some of the faithful no longer reached him, as though, indeed, some one had secretely diverted its flow. And eventually the day came when he was unable to make the stipulated payments. In all this there had been so much skilfully combined strangulation, of which he only became aware later on. Father Sempé, however, had once more prevailed on the Bishop to grant his favour exclusively to the Grotto. There was even a talk of some confidential circulars distributed through the various dioceses, so that the many sums of money offered by the faithful should no longer be sent to the parish. The voracious, insatiable Grotto was bent upon securing everything, and to such a point were things carried that five-hundred-frane notes slipped into the collection-box at the Basilica were kept back; the box was rifled and the parish robbed. Abbé Peyramale, however, in his passion for the rising church, his child, continued fighting most desperately, ready if need were to give his blood. He had at first treated with the contractor in the name of the vestry; then, when he was at a loss how to pay, he treated in his own name. His life was bound up in the enterprise, he wore himself out in the heroic efforts which he made. Of the four hundred thousand francs that he had promised, he had only been able to pay two hundred thousand; and the municipal council still obstinately refused to hand over the hundred thousand francs which it had voted, until the new church should be covered in. This was acting against the town's real interests. However, it was said that Father Sempe was secretly trying to bring influence to bear on the contractor. And, all at once, the work was stopped.

From that moment the death agony began. Wounded in the heart, the Abbé Peyramale, the broad-shouldered mountaineer with the leonine face, staggered and fell like an oak struck down by a thunderbolt. He took to his bed, and never left it alive. Strange stories circulated: it was said that Father Sempé had sought to secure admission to the parsonage under some pious pretext, but in reality to see if his much-dreaded adversary were really mortally stricken; and it was added that it had been necessary to drive him from the sickroom, where his presence was an outrageous scandal. Then, when the unhappy priest, vanquished and steeped in bitterness, was dead, Father Sempé was seen triumphing at the funeral, from which the others had not dared to keep him away. It was affirmed that he openly displayed his abominable delight, that day with the joy of victory. He was at last rid of the only man who had been an obstacle to his designs, whose legitimate authority he had feared. He would no longer be forced to share anything with anybody now that both the founders of Our Lady of Lourdes had been suppressed—Bernadette placed in a convent, and Abbé Peyramale lowered into the ground. The Grotto was now his own property, the alms would come to him alone, and he could do what he pleased with the 800,000 frances or so (32,000.2) which were the site selected for the new parish church was criticised, and the all the registered letters were at once taken to the Fathers. Then longer opened the envelopes containing remittances for the parish; a simple-minded creature, was cowed to such a point that he no eruelty and slow destruction. To begin with, the new parish priest, ruin. The secret labour therefore, continued, a work of refined town might some day attempt to finish it. Like Abbé Pyramale, therefore it must be killed for good, turned into an irreparable ted. And the imperfect pile remained there like a threat, for the parish church was slumbering inside its wooden fence, it was none the less more than half built. The vaulted aisles were already erec-However, although the works had been stopped, and the new hencetorth would reign. neighbour. All the money, all the sovereignty, would be his; he ficant parish submerged beneath the splendour of its all-powerful lation of the old one and seclude it behind its rock, like an insigniassist in embellishing the new towns in order to increase the isoat his disposal every year. He would complete the gigantic works destined to make the Basiliea a self-supporting centre, and LHE LIAO AICLINS 243

dred thousand francs for the five lundred thousand francs worth of work which had been executed, had taken proceedings against Abbe Peyrannale's heir-at-law, the vestry, and the town, for the the unfinished church under interdiet, and prohibiting ail religious services in it. This was the supreme blow. Endless law-suits had already begun; the contractor, who had only received two hunpur piessed the foundation-stone, issued a pastoral letter laying through whose undisciplined zeal the Church had almost been compromised. And at last the Bishop, forgetting that he hiniself poor Pcyrainale was transformed into a violent, obstinate madman, which had arisen with the contracter. With a little imagination him respecting the annoying features of the pecuniary difficulties proacht to bear on the Bishop, and representations were made to the requirements of the community, Moreover, influence was the old clinreh was still in good condition and of ample size for dioccean architect was induced to draw up a report stating that mained owing to the contractor, However, the costs' and the lasted fifteen years. The town had now resignedly paid over the hundred thousand francs, and only two hundred thousand tranes, being solvent, matters remained in this position. The laysuits had which quashed this judgment, and condenned the vestry, and, in court. However, there was a fresh appeal to the Council of State, ed to pay the hundred thousand france and the heir-at-law to with the ease, and when it was sent back to it by the Council of State, it rendered a judgment by which the town was condemn-At first the Prefect's Council declared itself incompetent to deal latter still refused to pay over the amount which it had voted,

At the same time the vestry was put out of

Neither party

default, the heir-at-law, to pay the contractor, finish the church.

"It will soon be ten o'clock, my dear child," said he, "and I want you to take a little rest. Let us go back."

Pierre followed him without speaking, and they retraced their

Abbé Peyramale's unfinished church this evening?" have been talking to you. You must see them, lay your hand on them, lay your hand You must see them, lay your hand Yet understand all the woeful sadness of the things of which I steps towards the town at a more rapid parce. "Ah, yes," resumed the doctor, "there were great iniquities and great sufferings in it all. But what else could you expect? Man spoils and corrupts the most beautiful things. And you cannot spoils and corrupts the most beautiful things.

"Yes, I should indeed!" replied Pierre.

"Well, I will meet you in front of the Basiliea after the four

Then they spoke no further, each becoming absorbed in his o clock procession, and you can come with me."

reverie once more,

assumed a deeper tinge above the vast circle of mountains.
And it was at this turn of the road that Lourdes, still some hot, and was already high in the heavens, whose limpid azure The sun was now becoming you soil was ravined on all sides. sheets which must often have changed their beds, for the gravelly on after a sudden turn in the road, they found it showing in in-creased volume across a plain, where it spread at times, into glassy looking like unburnished silver, would appear to view; and, farther sight among the bushes. But at intervals a clear stretch of it, deep gorge, a kind of eleft into which it plunged, rauishing from The Cave, now upon their right hand, was flowing through a call his companions' attention to this growing town, as though to a proof of all that he had been telling him. There, indeed, rising up in the dazzling daylight, was the evidence which confirmed his words at last waved his arm with a broad, mournful gesture in order to each step which brought them nearer. And the doctor, still silent, ne pourse and monuments becoming more and more distinct at gold and purple rays, the town showed whitely on the horizon, saigne, in the splendid morning atmosphere, amid a fixing dust of distance away, reappeared to the eyes of Pierre and Doctor Chas-

the great convents and the great hotels, you could, at this distriall around the monuments, the wealthy city which had sprang as though by enchantment from the ancient impoverished soil, the great terms as sive church of the Rosary, and, finally, the slim, tapering Basilica using above all else with graceful pride. Of the new town spread all ground the recently opened boulevard; the colossal gradient-ways, the masdiverted; the new bridge connecting the new gardens with the its freestone parapet skirting the Gave, whose course find been wards the gigantie monumental works spread out: the quay with could already be espied amidst the greenery. And soon after-The flare of the Grotto, fainter now that the sun was slining, irmed his words.

accumulated interest had so increased the amount of indebtedness that it had risen to six hundred thousand francs; and as, on the other hand, it was estimated that four hundred thousand franes would be required to finish the church, a million was needed to save this young ruin from certain destruction. The Fathers of the Grotto were theneeforth able to sleep in peace; they had assassinated the poor church; it was as dead as Abbé Peyramale himself.

The bells of the Basiliea rang out triumphantly, and Father Sempé reigned as a victor at the conclusion of that great struggle, that dagger warfare in which not only a man, but stones also, had been done to death in the shrouding gloom of intriguing sacristics. And old Lourdes, obstinate and unintelligent, paid a hard penalty for its minister, who had died struggling, killed by his love for his parish, for now the new town did not cease to grow and prosper at the expense of the old one. All the wealth flowed to the former: the Fathers of the Grotto coined money, financed hotels and candle shops, and sold the water of the source, although a clause of their agreement with the municipality expressly prohihited them from carrying on any commercial pursuits.

The whole region began to rot and fester: the triumph of the Grotto had brought about such a passion for lucre, such a burning, feverish desire to possess and enjoy, that extraordinary perversion set in, growing worse and worse each day, and changing Bernadette's peaceful Bethlehem into a perfect Sodom or Gomorrah. Father Sempe had ensured the triumph of his Divinity by spreading human abominations all around and wreeking thousands of souls. Gigantic buildings rose from the ground, five or six millions of francs had already been expended, everything being sacrificed to the stern determination to leave the poor parish out in the cold and keep the entire plunder for self and friends. Those costly, colossal gradient-ways had only been erected in order to avoid compliance with the Virgin's express desire that the faithful should come to the Grotto in procession. For to go down from the Basiliea by the incline on the left, and climb up to it again by the incline on the right, could certainly not be called going to the Grotto in procession: it was simply so much revolving in a circle. However, the Fathers cared little about that; they had succeeded in compelling people to start from their premises and return to them, in order that they might be the sole proprietors of the affair, the opulent farmers who garnered the whole harvest. Abbé Peyramale lay buried in the crypt of his unfinished, ruined church, and Bernadette, who had long since dragged out her life of suffering in the depths of a convent far away, was now likewise sleeping the eternal sleep under a flagstone in a chapel.

Deep silence fell when Doetor Chassaigne had finished this long narrative. Then, with a painful effort, he rose to his feet again:

"It will soon he ten o'clock, my dear child," said be, "and t want you to take a little rest. Let us go hack."

Pierre followed him without speaking; and they retract their steps towards the town at a more rapid pace.

on them. Would you like me to show you Bernadette's room and have been talking to you. You must see them, lay your land I daily to eguid of the world sadness of the things of which I great sufferings in it all. But what else could you expect? Alon spoils and corrupts the most beautiful things. And you cannot his yes," resunned the doctor, "there were great inequities and Abbe Peyramale's unfinished church this evenings?

"Well, I will meet you in front of the Basilica after the four "Yes, I should indeed!" replied Pierre.

o'clock procession, and you can come with me."

Then they spoke no further, each becaming absorbed in his deep gorge, a kind of eleft into which it plunged, vanishing trom The Gave, now upon their right hand, was flowing through a reverie once more.

hot, and was already high in the heavens, whose limpid axure sheets which must often have changed their beds, for the gravelly soil was ravined on all sides. The sun was now becoming very creased volume across a plain, where it spread at times into glassy on after a sudden turn in the road, they found it flowing in insight among the bushes. But at intervals a clear stretch of it, looking like unburnished silver, would appear to view; and, farther distance away, reappeared to the eyes of Pierre and Doctor Charassumed a deeper tinge above the vast circle of monatains. And it was at this turn of the road that Lourdes, till some call his companions' aftention to this growing town, as though to a proof of all that he had been telling him. Times indeed, rising up in the dazzling daylight, was the evidence which each firmed his words. at last waved his arm with a broad, mountial gesture in order to cach step which brought them nearer. And the dector, ctill effect, he traiteib erent bag erom gnimoood einenungen bag eeron ein gold and purple rays, the town showed whitely on the herizon, saigne. In the splendid morning atmosphere, amid a flying durt of firmed his words.

necumulated interest had so increased the amount of indebtedness that it had risen to six hundred thousand franes; and as, on the other hand, it was estimated that four hundred thousand franes would be required to finish the church, a million was needed to save this young ruin from certain destruction. The Fathers of the Grotto were thenceforth able to sleep in peace; they had assassinated the poor church; it was as dead as Abbé Peyramale himself.

The bells of the Basiliea rang out triumphantly, and Father Sempé reigned as a victor at the conclusion of that great struggle, that dagger warfare in which not only a man, but stones also, had been done to death in the shronding gloom of intriguing sacristies. And old Lourdes, obstinate and unintelligent, paid a hard penalty for its minister, who had died struggling, killed by his love for his parish, for now the new town did not cease to grow and prosper at the expense of the old one. All the wealth flowed to the former: the Fathers of the Grotto coined money, financed hotels and candle shops, and sold the water of the source, although a clause of their agreement with the municipality expressly prohibited them from carrying on any commercial pursuits.

The whole region began to rot and fester; the triumph of the Grotto had brought about such a passion for lucre, such a burning, feverish desire to possess and enjoy, that extraordinary perversion set in, growing worse and worse each day, and changing Bernadette's peaceful Bethlehem into a perfect Sodom or Gomorrali. Father Sempé had ensured the triumph of his Divinity by spreading human abominations all around and wreeking thousands of souls. Gigantie buildings rose from the ground, five or six millions of francs had already been expended, everything being sacrificed to the stern determination to leave the poor parish out in the cold and keep the entire plunder for self and friends. Those costly, eolossal gradient-ways had only been erected in order to avoid compliance with the Virgin's express desire that the faithful should come to the Grotto in procession. For to go down from the Basiliea by the incline on the left, and climb up to it again by the incline on the right, could certainly not be called going to the Grotto in procession: it was simply so much revolving in a circle. However, the Fathers cared little about that; they had succeeded in compelling people to start from their premises and return to them, in order that they might be the sole proprietors of the affair, the opulent farmers who garnered the whole harvest. Abbé Peyramale lay buried in the erypt of his unfinished, ruined church, and Bernadette, who had long since dragged out her life of suffering in the depths of a convent far away, was now likewise sleeping the eternal sleep under a flagstone in a chapel.

Deep silence fell when Doctor Chassaigne had finished this long narrative. Then, with a painful effort, he rose to his feet again:

THE FOURTH DAY

Ι

THE BILLERNESS OF DEATH

she asked: "What day is it, madame?" her, to raise one of the pillows which was slipping from its place, take her back there, And, as Madame de Jonquiére approached Ar the Hospital of Our Lady of Dolours, that morning, Marier remained seated on her bed, propped up by pillows. Having spent the whole night at the Crotto, she had refused to let them

"Monday, my dear child."

sunlight, purified by the morning air, and wrapped in such deliatmosphere and its nightmare groons, thus suddenly filled with at night-time with its many beds of siekness, its unhealthy Dale hands. It was indeed pleasant to find this room, so dismal golden dust was daneing over her bed and streaming upon her the glorious morning sunshine entered in one broad beam, whose the windows overlooking the courtyard had been opened, and To anO delighted with the sudden stillness which had fallen. hast extremity in the next bed, having already started for the Grotto, But, Maric did not even notice her neighbour, she was deserted, all the patients, excepting Madame Vetu, who lay at the hope, Round about her the Sainte-Honorine Ward was now quite gazing into vacancy, her thoughts so far away, so absorbed in her one fixed idea, that she beheld nothing save the certainty of her She smiled divinely, with the air of a day-dreamer, her eyes "Ahl true. One so soon loses count of the time. And, besides, I am so happpy it is to-day, that the Blessed Virgin will cure mel"

"You must be quite worn out by your Madame de Jonquière. "Why don't you try to sleep a littles" maternally inquired cions silencel

"Jigiv lo idgin

perienced any pain, seemed surprised. Marie, who felt so light and cheerful that she no longer ex-

"But I ann not at all tired, and I don't feel a bit sleepy. Co

That I was going to be cured? to sleep? On nol that would be too sad. I should no longer know them take you to the Grotto?" she asked. "You won't know what to do with yourself all alone here." At this the superintendent laughed. "Then why didn't you let thereupon, her vision returning to her, she clasped her hands in ecstasy. "Last night, you know, I saw her bend her head towards "I am not alone, madame, I am with her," replied Marie; and

merely distinguish a swarming of white façades and a scintillation of new slates; whilst, in confusion, far away, beyond the rocky mass, on which the crumbling castle walls were profiled against the sky, appeared the humble roofs of the old town, a jumble of little time-worn roofs, pressing timorously against one another. And as a background to this vision of the lite of yesterday and today, the little and the big Gers rose up beneath the splendour of the everlasting sun, and barred the horizon with their bare slopes, which the oblique rays were tinging with streaks of pink and vellow.

Doctor Chassaigne insisted on accompanying Pierre to the Hotel of the Apparitions, and only parted from him at its door, after reminding him of their appointment for the afternoon. It was not yet eleven o'clock. Pierre, whom fatigue had suddenly mastered, forced himself to eat before going to bed, for he realised that want of food was one of the chief causes of the weakness which had come over him. He fortunately found a vacant seat at the table. A'hôte, and made some kind of a déjeuner, half asleep all the time, and scarcely knowing what was served to him. Then he went upstairs and flung himself on his bed, after taking care to tell the servant to awake him at three o'clock.

However, on lying down, the fever that consumed him at first prevented him from closing his eyes. A pair of gloves, forgotten in the next room, had reminded him of M. de Guersaint, who had left for Gavarnie before daybreak, and would only return in the evening. What a delightful gift was thoughtlessness, thought Pierre. For his own part, with his limbs worn out by wearining seemed to conspire against his willing desire to regain the faith of his childhood. The tale of Abbé Peyramale's tragic adventures had simply aggravated the feeling of revolt which the story of Bernadette, chosen and martyred, had implanted in his breast. And thus he asked himself whether his search after the truth, instead of restoring his faith, would not rather lead him to yet greater hatred of ignorance and credulity, and to the bitter conviction that man is indeed all alone in the world, with naught to guide him save his reason.

At last he fell asleep, but visions continued hovering around him in his painful slumber. He beheld Lourdes, contaminated by Mammon, turned into a spot of abomination and perdition, transformed into a huge bazaar, where everything was sold, masses and souls alike! He beheld also Abbé Peyramale, dead and slumbering under the ruins of his church, among the nettles which ingratitude had sown there. And he only grew calm again, only tasted the delights of forgetfulness when a last pale, worful vision had faded from his gaze—a vision of Bernadette upon her knees in a gloomy corner at Nevers, dreaming of her far away work, which she was never, never to behold.

THE FOURTH DAY

I

THE BILLERNESS OF DEATH

she asked: "What day is it, madame?" "Monday, my dear child." her, to raise one of the pillows which was slipping from its place, cike her back there, And, as Madaine de Jonquiére approached spent the whole night at the Crotto, she had refused to let them AT the Hospital of Our Lady of Dolours, that morning, Marie remained seated on her bed, propped up by pillows. Having เออันอุเรี รมดูเอ similght, purified by the morning air, and wrapped in such deliat night-time with its many beds of siekness, its unhealthy atmosphere and its nightnare groans, thus suddenly filled with pale hands. It was indeed pleasant to find this room, so dismal tojqon quat was dancing over her bed and streaming upon her the glorious morning sunshine entered in one broad beam, whose the windows overlooking the courtyard had been opened, and delighted with the sudden stillness which had fallen. One of hast extremity in the next bed, having already started for the Grotto, But Marie did not even notice her neighbour; she was deserted, all the patients, excepting Madame Vêtu, who lay at the hope. Bound about her the Sainte-Honorine Ward was now quite She smiled divinely, with the nir of a day-dreamer, her eyes gazing into vacaney, her thoughts so far away, so absorbed in her one fixed idea, that she beheld nothing save the certainty of her "Ahl true. One so soon loses count of the time. And, besides, I min so happyl it is to-day that the Blessed Virgin will cure mell

"You must be quite worn out by your Madame de Jonquière. Why don't you try to sleep a little? maternally inquired hinrie, who felt so light and cheerful that she no longer ex-"Jigiv lo Jilgin perienced any pain, seemed surprised.

to sleep? Oh not that would be too sad. I should no longer know "But I min not at all tired, and I don't feel a bit sleepy.

That I was going to be enred!"

to do with yourself all alone here." At this the superintendent laughed. "Then why didn't you let them take you to the Grotto?" she asked. "You won't know what ecstasy. "Last night, you know, I saw her bend her head towards thereupon, her vision returning to her, she elasped her hands in "I am not alone, madame, I am with her," replied Marie; and

merely distinguish a swarming of white façades and a scintillation of new slates; whilst, in confusion, far away, beyond the rocky mass, on which the crumbling castle walls were profiled against the sky, appeared the humble roofs of the old town, a jumble of little time-worn roofs, pressing timorously against one another. And as a background to this vision of the life of yesterday and today, the little and the big Gers rose up beneath the splendour of the everlasting sun, and barred the horizon with their bare slopes, which the oblique rays were tinging with streaks of pink and vellow.

Doctor Chassaigne insisted on accompanying Pierre to the Hotel of the Apparitions, and only parted from him at its door, after reminding him of their appointment for the afternoon. It was not yet eleven o'clock. Pierre, whom fatigue had suddenly mastered, forced himself to cat before going to bed, for he realised that want of food was one of the chief causes of the weakness which had come over him. He fortunately found a vacant seat at the table. d'hôte, and made some kind of a déjeuner, half asleep all the time, and scarcely knowing what was served to him. Then he went upstairs and flung himself on his bed, after taking care to tell the servant to awake him at three o'clock.

However, on lying down, the fever that consumed him at first prevented him from closing his eyes. A pair of gloves, forgotten in the next room, had reminded him of M. de Guersaint, who had left for Gavarnie before daybreak, and would only return in the evening. What a delightful gift was thoughtlessness, thought Pierre. For his own part, with his limbs worn out by weariness and his mind distracted, he was sad unto death. Everything seemed to conspire against his willing desire to regain the faith of his childhood. The tale of Abbé Peyramale's tragic adventures had simply aggravated the feeling of revolt which the story of Bernadette, chosen and martyred, had implanted in his breast. And thus he asked himself whether his search after the truth, instead of restoring his faith, would not rather lead him to yet greater hatred of ignorance and credulity, and to the bitter conviction that man is indeed all alone in the world, with naught to guide him save his reason.

At last he fell asleep, but visions continued hovering around him in his painful slumber. He beheld Lourdes, contaminated by Mainmon, turned into a spot of abomination and perdition, transformed into a huge bazaar, where everything was sold, masses and souls alike! He beheld also Abbé Peyramale, dead and slumbering under the ruins of his church, among the nettles which ingratitude had sown there. And he only grew ealm again, only tasted the delights of forgetfulness when a last pale, woeful vision had faded from his gaze—a vision of Bernadette upon her knees in a gloomy corner at Nevers, dreaming of her far away work, which she was never, never to behold.

THE FOURTH DAY

THE BILLERINESS OF DEATH

take her back there. And, as Madaine de Jonquiére approached her, to raise one of the pillows which was shpping from its place, At the Hospital of Our Lady of Dolours, that morning, Marier remained seated on her bed, propped up by pillows. Having spent the whole night at the Crotte, she had refused to let them smilight, purified by the morning air, and wrapped in such deliatmosphere and its nightmare groans, thus suddenly filled with at night-time with its many beds of siekness, its unhealthy pale hands. It was indeed pleasant to find this room, so dismal kojqeu quet was daneing over her bed and etreaming upon her the glorious morning sunshine entered in one broad beam, whose the windows overlooking the courtyard had been opened, and delighted with the sudden stillness which had fallen. to anO But Marie did not even notice her neighbour; she was last extremity in the next bed, having already started for the deserted, all the patients, excepting Madame Vetu, who lay at the hope. Round about her the Sainte-Honorine Ward was now quite one fixed idea, that she beheld nothing save the certainty of her gazing into vacancy, her thoughts so far away, so absorbed in her She smiled divinely, with the air of a day-dreamer, her eyes "Ahl true. One so soon loses count of the time. And, besides, I am so happyl it is to-day' that the Blessed Virgin will cure mel' she asked: "What day is it, madame?" "Monday, my dear child."

".ligiv 10 tılgin "You must be quite wom out by your Madaine de Jonquière. Why don't you try to sleep a little?" maternally inquired cions silence!

Marie, who felt so light and cheerful that she no longer ex-

"But I am not at all tired, and I don't feel a bit sleepy. perioueed any pain, seemed surprised.

"You won't know what then take you to the Crotto?" she asked. At this the superintendent laughed. "Then why didn't you let to sleep? Oh not that would be too sad. I should no longer know that I was going to be cured!"

to do with yourself all alone here."

thereupon, her vision returning to her, she clasped her hands in ecstasy. "Last night, you know, I saw her bend her head towards "I am not alone, madame, I am with her," replied Marie; and me and smile. I quite understood her, I could hear her voice, although she never opened her lips. When the Blessed Sacrament passes at four o'clock I shall be cured."

Madame de Jonquiére tried to calm her, feeling rather anxious at the species of somnambulism in which she beheld her. However, the sick girl went on: "No, no, I am no worse, I am waiting. Only, you must surely see, madaine, that there is no need for me to go to the Grotto this morning, since the appointment which she gave me is for four o'clock." And then the girl added in a lower tone: "Pierre will come for me at half-past three. At four o'clock I shall be cured."

The sunbeam slowly made its way up her bare arms, which were now almost transparent, so wasted had they become through illness; whilst her glorious fair hair, which had fallen over her shoulders, seemed like the very effulgence of the great luminary enveloping her. The trill of a bird came in from the courtyard, and quite enlivened the tremulous silence of the ward. Some child who could not be seen must have been playing close by, for now and again a soft laugh could be heard ascending in the warm air which was so delightfully ealm.

"Well," said Madame de Jonquiére by way of conclusion, "don't sleep then, as you don't wish to. But keep quite quiet, and it will rest you all the same."

Meantime Madanie Vêtu was expiring in the adjoining bed. They had not dared to take her to the Grotto, for fear lest they should see her die on the way. For some little time she had lain there with her cycs closed, and Sister Hyacinthe, who was watching, had beekoned to Madame Désagneaux in order to acquaint her with the bad opinion she had formed of the casc. Both of them were now leaning over the dying woman, observing her with increasing anxiety. The mask upon her face had turned more vellow than ever, and now looked like mud; her eyes had become more sunken, her lips seemed to have grown thinner, and the death rattle had begun, a slow, pestilential wheezing, polluted by the cancer which was finishing its destructive work. All at once she raised her eyelids, and was seized with fear on beholding those two faces bent over her own. Could her death be near, that they should thus be gazing at her? Immense sadness showed itself in her eyes, a despairing regret of life. It was not a vehement revolt, for she no longer had the strength to struggle; but what a frightful fate it was to have left her shop, her surroundings, and her husband, merely to come and die so far away; to have braved the abominable torture of such a journey, to have prayed both day and night, and then, instead of having her prayer granted, to die when others recovered!

However, she could do no more than nurmur: "Oh, how I suffer! oh, how I suffer! Do something, anything, to relieve this pain, I beseech you."

since given up expecting aid from the skill of man, had Heaven to look to; it was her only hope, for she had long her a couple of hours earlier that very morning. She now only Abbe Judaine had come and administered the last sacrament to however? Could not something be tried to ease the dying woman? was assured when one died well. Could nothing really be done, she rose up and began to question Sister Hyaeinthe, who was also in tears but already resigned, knowing as she did that salvation heart, as she expressed it, to see that poor woman recover. And was not used to death-bed seenes; she would have given half her Little Madame Desagneaux, with her pretty milk-white face half-hidden by a mass of fair, frizzy hair, was quite upset. She eall that young doctor who is here?" Мһу пос mouning like this. There are things which give reliet. is suffering, madame," she exclaimed. she ean only last a few hours longer. But we eannot leave her "Sister Hyacinthe says that "No, nol we must do something," exclaimed Madanne Désag-aux, And thereupon she went and fetched Madanne de aquière from beside Marie's bed. "Look how this poor ereature Jondňijere from beside Afarie's bed.

"Of course we will," replied the superintendent, "We will send of Ferrand, whom she believed to be in an adjoining room, in-Sister Hyacinthe, who herself felt surprised at not having thought very worst, when one of their patients was howling with pain. for him at once."

They seldom thought of the doctor in the wards.

still came at intervals the light laughter of the unseen child. quiver of the sunlight such sweet tranquillity prevailed, having gone to their devotions or their private affairs. However, from the end of the large deserted ward, where, amidst the warm to be alone there that morning, all the other lady-hospitallers "Certainly," was the reply. "Bring him as quickly as possible."
When the Sister had gone, Madame de Jonquière made Madame
When the Sister had gone, Madame de Jonquière made Madame Désagneaux help her in slightly raising the dying woman's head, thinking that this might relieve her. The two ladies happened self up, mademoiselle," said she. "Dance the polka, that I may see how you can do it! One! two! dance, turn, kiss the one you like best!" out of a few rags. She was now talking to it, so happy, so absorbed in her play, that she laughed quite heartily. "Hold yoursalt managed to the play, that she laughed quite heartily. "Hold yoursalt managed to the play, that she have the safe in the play." vious year-who, scated on the floor behind a bed, had been amusing herself, despite her fourteen years, in making a doll 20pline Conteau-the young girl so miraeulously healed the prewalking to the end of the ward, she found that it was indeed by ill the worry of the death which she foresaw. Then quickly usked the lady-superintendent, whose nerves were slightly upset Can it be Sophie who is making such a noise?" suddenly

Madame de Jonquière, however, was now coming up. "Little girl," she said, "we have one of our patients here in great pain, and not expected to recover. You must not laugh so loud.".

"Ah, madame, I didn't know," replied Sophie, rising up, and becoming quite serious, although still holding the doll in her hand. "Is she going to die, madame?"

"I fear so, my poor child."

Thereupon Sophie became quite silent. She followed the superintendent, and seated herself on an adjoining bed; whence, without the slightest sign of fear, but with her large eyes burning with curiosity, she began to watch Madame Vêtu's death agony. In her nervous state, Madame Désagneaux was growing intended at the delay in the doctor's arrival; whilst Marie, still enraptured, and esplendent in the sunlight, seemed unconscious of what was taking place about her, wrapt as she was in delightful expectancy of the miracle.

Not having found Ferrand in the small apartment near the linen-room which he usually occupied, Sister Hyacinthe was now searching for him all over the building. During the past two days the young doctor had become more bewildered than ever in this extraordinary hospital, where his assistance was only sought for the relief of death pangs. The small medicine-chest which he had brought with him proved quite useless; for there could be no thought of trying any course of treatment, as the sick were not there to be doctored, but simply to be cured by the lightning stroke of a miracle. And so he mainly confined himself to administering a few opium pills, in order to deaden the severer sufferings. He had been fairly amazed when accompanying Doctor Bonamy on a round through the wards. It had resolved itself into a mere stroll, the doctor, who had only come out of curiosity, taking no interest in the patients, whom he neither questioned nor examined. He solely concerned himself with the pretended cases of cure, stopping opposite those women whom he recognised from having seen them at his office where the miracles were verified. One of them had suffered from three complaints, only one of which the Blessed Virgin had so far deigned to cure; but great hopes were entertained respecting the other two. Sometimes, when a wretched woman, who the day before had claimed to be cured, was questioned with reference to her health, she would reply that her pains had returned to her. However, this never disturbed the doctor's serenity; ever conciliatory, the good man declared that Heaven would surely complete what Heaven had begun. Whenever there was an improvement in health, he would ask if it were not something to be thankful for? And, indeed, his constant saying was: "There's an improvement already; be patient!" What he most dreaded were the importunities of the lady-superintendents, who all wished to detain him to show him sundry extraordinary cases. Each prided her-he described all the features of the illness, which had totally raud to his side, exclaimed: "Ahl now here is an interesting cure," and Ferrand, utterly bewildered, had to listen to him whilst site one of the minaculously cared immates, and, beekoning Feruscless consultations. However, he at last suddenly stopped opposaid, if he listened to all those ladies, the day would pass in come back later on when he was not so busy. As he himself refusing to see even one of them, or else simply promising to married lady, of the best society. He hastened away, however, whispering in his ear, gave him some terrible details about a whose back, she said was covered with fish scales, whilst a third, charge, another entreated him to come and look at a young girl arm and assured him that she felt confident she had a leper in her triumph should cure supervene. One caught the doctor by the medically authenticated, in order that she might share in the tional cases in her ward; so that she was eager to have them self on having the most serious illnesses, the most frightful, excep-

been able to do so in the morning. However, his pains increased, to retuin to the Crotto during the afternoon, as he had not soothed a little, in order that he might gather sufficient strength ings were as acute as ever, and whom he could only stuff with opinim. In his agony, the Brother himself merely asked to be he had gone down there to attend to Brother Isidore, whose suffer-At last Sister Hyacinthe, still wandering about, encountered Abbe Judaine, who informed her that the young doctor had just been summoned to the Family Ward. It was the fourth time disappeared at the first immersion in the piseina.

upstairs with me to the Sainte-Honorine Ward at once. We have "Monsieur Ferrand," she said, "come at the missionary's bedside, When the Sister entered the ward she found the doctor seated and at last he swooned away.

a patient there at the point of death."

ting, poor man." "But you'll wait a minute, won't you? I must try to restore brighter and comforted. "I will come with you, Sister," he replied. He smiled at her; indeed, he never beheld her without feeling Comfortably scated on his bed, his back supported by some pillows, the ex-professor was rolling the beads of a chaplet between his fingers. He was no longer praying, however, but merely continuing the occupation in a mechanical manner, his Comfortably presents. intended pictures, which 101 әųs pue advantage of the opportunity, had gone to purchase a tew on to a narrow strip of garden. In addition to Brother Isidore, only Monsieur Sabathier liad remained in bed that morning, in view of obtaining a little rest; whilst Madame Sabathier, taking the view of obtaining a little rest; whilst Madame Sabathier, taking the same of the same o fresh air, which entered through three large windows opening Vard, situated on the ground floor, was also full of sunshine and She waited patiently and made herself useful. The Family name!"

eyes, meantime fixed upon his neighbour, whose attack he was following with painful interest.

"Ah, Sister," said he to Sister Hyacinthe, who had drawn near, "that poor Brother fills me with admiration. Yesterday I doubted the Blessed Virgin for a moment, seeing that she still did not deign to hear me, though I have been coming here for seven years; but the example set me by that poor martyr, so resigned amidst his torments, has quite shamed me for my want of faith. You can have no idea how grievously he suffers, and you should see him at the Grotto, with his eyes glowing with divine hope! It is really sublimel I only know of one, picture at the Louvrea picture by some unknown Italian master—in which there is the head of a monk beatified by a similar faith."

The man of intellect, the ex-university professor, reared on literature and art, was reappearing in this poor old fellow, whose life had been blasted, and who had desired to become a free patient, one of the poor of the earth, in order to move the pity of He again began thinking of his own ease, and with tenacious hopefulness, which the futility of seven journeys to Lourdes had failed to destroy, he added: "Well, I still have this afternoon, since we shan't leave till to-morrow. The water is certainly very cold, but I shall let them dip me a last time; and all the morning I have been praving and asking pardon for my revolt of yesterday. When the Blessed Virgin chooses to cure one of her children it only takes her a second to do so; is that not so. Sister? May her will be done, and blessed be her

Passing the beads of the chaplet more slowly between his fingers, he again began saying his "Aves" and "Paters," whilst his eyelids drooped in his flabby face, to which a childish expression had been returning during the many years that he had been virtually eut off from the world.

. Meantime Ferrand had signalled to Brother Isidore's sister, Marthe, to come to him. She had been standing at the foot of the bed with her arms hanging down beside her, showing the tearless resignation of a poor, narrow-minded girl whilst she watched that dying man whom she worshipped. She was no more than a faithful dog; she had accompanied her brother and spent her seanty savings, without being of any use save to watch him suffer. Accordingly, when the doctor told her to take the invalid in her arms and raise him up a little, she felt quite happy at being of some service at last. Her heavy, freekled, mournful face actually grew bright.
"Hold him," said the doctor, "whilst I try to give him this."

When she had raised him, Ferrand, with the aid of a small. spoon, succeeded in introducing a few drops of liquid between his set teeth. Almost immediately the sick man opened his eyes and heaved a deep sigh. He was ealmer already; the opium was taking to the Crotto, this afternoon. I am certain that, if I am able to go, the Blessed Virgin will cure me."

"Why, of course you shall go, replied the young man. "Don't you feel ever so much better?" over him. "You are the doctor, monsieur, are you note more faltered. "Give me sufficient strength that I may go once more to feel if I am able to he remained so weak that, when he wished to speak, it became necessary to place one's car close to his mouth in order to eatch what he said. With a slight sign he had begged Ferrand to bend over him. "You are the doctor, monsieur, are you not?" he over him. "You are the doctor, monsieur, are you not?" he as though a red-hot iron were being applied to it. However, effect and dulling the pain which he felt burning his right side, worked its way outside, it means the end. Sweating, fever, and deliming follow. But the Blessed Virgin will touch the sore with her little finger and it will be healed. Ohl I implore you When the liver is attacked and the abseess has านรอกอริกน condition is, hecanse I saw many of our Brothers die, out there "Old ever so much better-nol I know very well what my all, take me to the Grotto, even if I should be unconscious!" Sister Hyacinthe had also approached, and leant over him.

"Be easy, dear Brother," said she. "You shall go to the Grotto after dejeuner, and we will all pray for you."

Absolute hopelessness. It was madness to come to Lourdes when in such a condition. However, he hastened to add, with a smile: "I heg your pardon, Sister. You know that I am unfortunate enough not to be a heliever." really no more hope. The other made a gesture expressive of the Brother's state filled her with pity; and, as they ascended the stairs, she questioned the doctor, asking him if there were about Madame Vetu, she was able to get Ferrand away. At length, in despair at these delays and extremely anxious matter, she replied. "I know you; you're all the same a good fellow. Besides, we see so many people, we go amongst such pagins, that it would be difficult to shock us." But she smiled in her turn, like an indulgent friend who tolerates the shorteomings of those she loves. "Ohl that doesn't the Grotto-and she gave expression to it in the stammering he foresay. She was watching him, still conscious, and also very obedient, never refusing the medicine offered her. Like the others, she now had but one ardent desire—to go back to shipety her also, in order to ease the atrocious death-agony which of hours, perhaps merely of minutes. All he could do was to shoulders, that she was a lost woman, that it was only a question hed, their faces turning pale, their hearts distracted by that death-cry, which never ceased. And when they consulted Ferrand in a whisper, he merely replied, with a slight shrug of the choulders that the merely replied, with a slight shrug of the choulders that the merely replied, with a slight shrug of the choulders that the merel of the merel of the choulders that the merel of the choulders the contract of the contract of the contract of the choice of the contract of the de Jonquière and Madame Désagneaux had remained beside the Vety still moaning, a prey to most intolerable suffering. Madame Up above, in the Sainte-Honorine Ward, they found Madame accents of a child who fears that its prayer may not be granted:

"To the Grotto—will you? To the Grotto!"
"You shall be taken there by-and-by, I promise you," said Sister Hyacinthe. "But you must be good. Try to sleep a little, to gain some strength."

The sick woman appeared to sink into a doze, and Madame de Jonquière then thought that she might take Madamc Désagneaux with her to the other end of the ward to count the linen, a troublesome business, in which they became quite bewildered, as some of the articles were missing. Meantime Sophic, scated on the bed opposite Madame Vêtu, had not stirred. She had laid her doll on her lap, and was waiting for the lady's death, since they had told her that she was about to die. Sister Hya-cinthe, moreover, had remained beside the dying woman, and, unwilling to waste her time, had taken a needle and cotton to mend some patient's bodiee which had a hole in the sleeve.

"You'll stay a little while with us, won't you?" she asked

Ferrand.

The latter, who was still watching Madame Vêtu, replied: "Yes, yes. She may go off at any moment. I fear hæmorrhage."

Then, catching sight of Marie on the neighbouring bed, he added in a lower voice: "How is she? Has she experienced any relief?"

"No, not yet. Ah, dear child! we all pray for her very sincerely. She is so young, so sweet, and so sorely afflicted. Just look at her now! Isn't she pretty? One might think her a saint amid all this sunshine, with her large, costatic eyes, and her golden hair shining like an aureola!"

Ferrand watched Marie for a moment with interest. Her absent air, her indifference to all about her, the ardent faith, the internal joy which so completely absorbed her, suprised him. "She will recover," he murmured, as though giving utterance to a prognostic. "She will recover."

nostic.

Then he rejoined Sister Hyacinthe, who had seated herself in the embrasure of the lofty window, which stood wide open, admitting the warm air of the courtyard. The sun was now creeping round, and only a narrow golden ray fell upon her white coif and wimple. Ferrand stood opposite to her, leaning against the window bar, and watching her while she sewed. "Do you know, Sister," said he, "this journey to Lourdes, which I undertook to oblige a friend, will be one of the few delights of my life."

She did not understand him, but innocently asked: "Why so?"

"Because I have found you again, because I am here with you, assisting you in your admirable work. And if you only knew how grateful I am to you, what sincere affection and reverence I feel for you."

She raised her head to look him straight in the face, and began jesting without the least constraint. She was really delicious, with her pure lily-white complexion, her small laughing mouth, if adorable blue eyes which ever smiled. And you could realise it she had grown up in all innocence and devotion, slender and open all the appearance of a girl hardly in her teens.

ople, with all the appearance of a girl hardly in her teens. "Vyhatl You are so fond of me as all that!" she exclaimed. "Why!" "Why I'm fond of you? Because you are the best, the most nsoling, the most sisterly of beings. You are the sweetest

"Why I'm fond of you? Because you are the best, the most nsoling, the most sisterly of beings. You are the sweetest smory in my life, the memory I evoke whenever I need to be couraged and sustained. Do you no longer remember the onth we spent together, in my poor room, when I was so ill a you so affectionately nursed me?"

d you so affectionately nursed me?"

"Of course, of course I remember it! Why, I never had so od a patient as you. You took all I offered you, and when I cked you in, after changing your linen, you remained as still, a little child."

a little child."
So speaking, she continued looking at him, smiling ingenuously c while. He was very handsome and robust, in the very prime youth, with a rather pronounced nose, superb eyes, and red ps showing under his black moustache. But she seemed to be mply pleased at seeing him standing before her moved almost to sats.

"Ah, Sister, I should have died if it hadn't been for you," he id. "It was through having you that I was cured."
Then, as they gazed at one another, with tender gaiety of heart,

They were indeed far removed from the frailties of life. And when he became convalescent, what a happy existence began, how purity born of suffering and charity shielding them both the while. tion, without the slightest embarrassment or repugnance, the holy him in and out of bed, and rendering him every necessary aftenaffections of a sister, radiated from her person. During three weeks, as she had said, she had nursed him like a child, helping of her manner; and yet all the tender love of a mother, all the hands, the caressing accents of her voice, the beneficent gentleness might be a woman, except it were for the extreme softness of her sext and he, on his side, never seemed to have suspected that she feeling perfectly happy so long as she had something to do, some sufferer to relieve. She never displayed any consciousness of her from her convent like a comrade who fears nothing! It was thus that she mused women, children, and men, as chance ordained, who had appeared there like a good angel, who had quictly come none there together—he who had been prostrated by fever, she low opening on to a sea of roofs, And how charming it was to be aris, where air and light only reached them through a tiny winound themselves in a small attic at the top of a dingy house in old mbulance improvised after a public catastrophe. They once more ittered with beds, and, with all its disorder, resembling some onger heard Madame Vêtu's death moans, nor beheld the ward he memory of that adorable month recurred to them. They no Then, as they gazed at one another, with tender gaiety of heart, ioyously they laughed like two old friends! She still watched over him, scolding him and gently slapping his arms when he persisted in keeping them uncovered. He would watch her standing at the basin, washing him a shirt in order to save him the trifling expense of employing a laundress. No one ever came up there; they were quite alone, thousands of miles away from the world, delighted with this solitude, in which their youth displayed such fraternal gaiety.

"Do you remember, Sister, the morning when I was first able to walk about?" asked Ferrand. "You helped me to get up, and supported me whilst I awkwardly stumbled about, no longer knowing how to use my legs. We did laugh so."

"Yes, yes, you were saved, and I was very pleased." "And the day when you brought me some cherries-I can see it all again: myself reclining on my pillows, and you seated at the edge of the bed, with the cherries lying between us in a large piece of white paper. I refused to touch them unless you ate some with me. And then we took them in turn, one at a time. until the paper was emntied; and they were very nice."

"Yes, yes, very nice. It was the same with the currant syrup.

you would only drink it when I took some also."

Thereupon they laughed yet louder; these recollections quite delighted them. But a painful sigh from Madame Vêtu brought them back to the present. Ferrand leant over and east a glance at the sick woman, who had not stirred. The ward was still full of a quivering peacefulness, which was only broken by the clear voice of Madame Desagneaux counting the linen. Stifling with emotion, the young man resumed in a lower tone: "Ah, Sister, were I to live a hundred years, to know every joy, every pleasure, I should never love another woman as I love you!'

Then Sister Hyacinthe, without, however, showing any confusion, bowed her head and resumed her sewing. An almost imperceptible blush tinged her lily-white skin with pink.

. "I also love you well, Monsieur Ferrand," she said, "but you must not make me vain. I only did for you what I do for so many others. It is my business, you see. And there was really only one pleasant thing about it all, that the Almighty eured you."

They were now again interrupted. La Grivotte and Elise Rouquet had returned from the Grotto before the others. La Grivotte at once squatted down on her mattress on the floor, at the foot of Madame Vêtu's bed, and, taking a piece of bread from her pocket, proceeded to devour it. Ferrand, since the day before, had felt some interest in this consumptive patient, who was traversing such a curious phase of agitation, a prey to an inordinate appetite and a feverish need of motion. For the moment, however, Elise Rouquet's ease interested him still more; for it had now become evident that the lupus, the sore which was eating way her face, was showing signs of care. She had continued althing her face at the initiaculous foundain, and had just come om the Verification Office, where Doctor Bonany laid triumhed. Ferrand, quite surprised, went and examined the sore, high, although still far from healed, was already paler in colour ad slightly desiccated, displaying all the symptoms of gradual net slightly desiccated, displaying all the symptoms of gradual or mely and the resolved are, and the case scenned to him so curious, that he resolved inch and the resolved and can note in the resolved and the fact that the symptoms of gradual solicity and the strong or gradual products and the strong of the resolved are notes upon it for one of his old masters at the redical college, who was studying the nervous origin of certain sim diseases due to faulty nutrition.

"Have you felt any pricking sensation?" he asked.
"Not at all, monsieur, she replied. "I bathe my face and tell ny beads with my whole soul, and that is all."

beads with my whole som, and tealous, and ever since the day effore had been going in triumph among the crowds, thereupon alled to the doctor. "I say, monsieur, I am cured, cured, cured, ompletely!"

The waved his hand to her in a friendly way, but refused io ramine her. "I know, my girl. There is nothing more the natter with you."

Just then Sister Hyacinthe called to him. She had put her ewing down on seeing Madame Vêtu raise herself in a frightful it of nansea. In spite of her haste, however, she was too late with the basin; the sick woman had brought up another discharge of black matter, similar to soot, but, this time, some blood was in black matter, similar to soot, but, this time, some blood was nixed with it, little specks of violet-coloured blood. It was the hamorrhage coming, the near end which Ferrand had been the hamorrhage coming, the near end which Ferrand had been the hamorrhage coming, the near end which Ferrand had been hamorrhage coming, the near end which Ferrand had been the hamorrhage coming, the near end which Ferrand had been the hamorrhage coming, the near end which Ferrand had been hamorrhage coming, the near end which Ferrand had been the hamorrhage coming, the near end which Ferrand had been the hamorrhage coming, the near end which Ferrand had been hand had been hamorrhage coming the near end which Ferrand had been hand had been had dreading. "Send for the superintendent," he said in a low voice, seating It was now the mother's turn to rejoice. Lively satisfactio appeared upon her face, the fat face of a ripe, handsome, and st agreeable woman. She at once beheld in her mind's eye the little lodging in the Rue Vaneau, where, since her husband's deat she had reared her daughter with great difficulty upon the fe thousand francs he had left her. This marriage, however, mean a return to life, to society, the good old times come back one more:

"Ah, my child, how happy you make me!" she exclaimed.

But a feeling of uneasiness suddenly restrained her. God was her witness that for three years past she had been coming a Lourdes through pure motives of charity, for the one great journess of nursing His beloved invalids. Perhaps, had she closely examined her eonscience, she might, behind her devotion, have found some trace of her fondness for authority, which rendere her present managerial duties extremely pleasant to her. However, the hope of finding a husband for her daughter among the suitable young men who swarmed at the Grotto was certain her last thought. It was a thought which came to her, of cours but merely as something that was possible, though she never mentioned it. However, her happiness wrung an avowal from her

"Ah, my child, your success doesn't surprise mc. I praye to the Blessed Virgin for it this morning."

Then she wished to be quite sure, and asked for further info mation. Raymonde had not yet told her of her long walk leanin on Gérard's arm the day before, for she did not wish to spea of such things until she was triumphant, certain of having a last secured a husband. And now it was indeed settled, as sh had exclaimed so gaily: that very morning she had again seen th young man at the Grotto, and he had formally become engage to her. M. Berthaud would undoubtedly ask for her hand on his cousin's behalf before they took their departure from Lourdes.

"Well," declared Madame de Jonquière, who was now corvinced, smiling, and delighted at heart, "I hope you will b happy, since you are so sensible, and do not need my aid t bring your affairs to a successful issue. Kiss me."

It was at this moment that Sister Hyacinthe arrived to announc Madame Vêtu's imminent death. Raymonde at once ran off And Madame Désagneaux, who was wiping her hands, begat to complain of the lady-assistants, who had all disappeared precisely on the morning when they were most wanted. "For instance," said she, "there's Madame Volmar. I should like to know where she can have got to. She has not been seen, even for a hour, ever since our arrival."

"Pray leave Madame Volmar alone!" replied Madame de Jon quière with some asperity. "I have already told you that she is ill.

They both hastened to Madame Vêtu. Ferrand stood there dent thereupon bent over her and heard these slowly uttered words:

"About my husband, madame—the shop is in the Rue Mouffetard—oh! it's quite a tiny one, not far from the Gobelins—He's a clockmaker, he is; he couldn't come with me, of course, having to attend to the business, and he will be very much put out when he finds I don't come back—Yes, I cleaned the jewellery and did the errands——"Then her voice grew fainter, her words disjointed by the death-rattle, which began. "Therefore, madame, I beg you will write to him, because I haven't done so, and now here's the end—Tell him my body had better remain at Lourdes, on account of the expense—And he must marry again; it's necessary for one in trade—His cousin—tell him his cousin—"

The rest became a confused murmur. Her weakness was too great, her breath was halting. Yet her eyes continued open and full of life, amid her pale, yellow, waxy mask. And those eyes seemed to fix themselves despairingly on the past, on all that which soon would be no more: the little clock-maker's shop hidden away in a populous neighbourhood; the gentle humdrum existence, with a toiling husband who was ever bending over his watches; and the great pleasures of Sunday, such as watching children fly their kites upon the fortifications. And at last those staring eyes gazed vainly into the frightful night which was gathering.

A last time did Madame de Jonquière lean over her, seeing that her lips were again moving. There came but a faint breath, a voice from far away, which distantly murmured in an accent of intense grief: "She did not cure me."

And then Madame Vêtu expired very gently.

As though this were all that she had been waiting for, little Sophie Couteau jumped from the bed quite satisfied, and went off to play with her doll again at the far end of the ward. Neither La Grivotte, who was finishing her bread, nor Elise Rouquet, busy with her mirror, noticed the catastrophe. However, amidst the cold breath which seemingly swept by, while Madame de Jonquière and Madame Désagneaux—the latter who was unaccustomed to the sight of death—were whispering together in agitation, Marie emerged from the expectant rapture in which the continuous, unspoken prayer of her whole being had plunged her so long. And when she understood what had happened, a feeling of sisterly compassion—the compassion of a suffering companion, on her side certain of cure—brought tears to her eyes.

"Ah, the poor woman!" she murmured: "to think that she has

"Ah, the poor woman!" she murmured: "to think that she has died so far from home, in such loneliness, at the hour when others are being born ancw!"

Ferrand, who, in spite of professional indifference, had also been stirred by the scene, stepped forward to verify the death; and it was on a sign from him that Sister Hyacinthe turned up the sheet, and threw it over the dead woman's face, for there could be no question of removing the corpse at that moment. The patients were now returning from the Crotto in bands, and the ward, inflicito so calm, so full of smaline, was again filling with the tunnil of wretchedness and pain—deep coughing and feeble shuffling, mingled with a noisonne smell—a pitiful display, in fact, of well-nigh every human infirmity.

H

THE SERVICE AT THE CROTTO

On that day, Monday, the crowd at the Grotto was enormons, It was the last day that the national pilgrinnage would spend at Lourdes, and Father Fourcade, in his morning address, had said that it would be necessary to make a supreme effort of forvour and faith to obtain from Heaven all that it might be willing to grant in the way of grace and prodigious ente. So, from two o'cloak in the unyof grace and prodigious enter. So, from two o'cloak in the unyof grace and prodigious enter. So, from two o'cloak in the unyof grace and prodigious enter. So, from two o'cloak in the unternoon, twenty thousand pilgrints were assembled indice, feverish, and agitated by the most ardent hopes. From minute the crowd continued increasing, to such a point, indeed, that Baron Suire became alarmed, and came out of the thirt service in the crowd continued increasing, to say to Berthaud: "My friend, we shall be overwhelmed, that say to Berthaud: "My friend, we shall be overwhelmed, that several says to berthaud: "My friend, we shall be overwhelmed."

Grotto to say to Berthaud: "My friend, we shall be overwhelmed, that say to Berthaud: "My friend, we shall be overwhelmed."

Grotto to say to Berthaud: "My friend, we shall be overwhelmed."

Grotto to say to Berthaud: "My friend, we shall be overwhelmed."

Grotto to say to Berthaud: "My friend, we shall be overwhelmed."

The Hospitality of our Lady of Salutation was alone entrusted with the task of keeping order, for there were neither guardians nor policemen of any sort present; and it was for this reason that the President of the Association was so alarmed. However Berthand, under grave circumstances, was a leader whose words combined, under grave circumstances, was a leader whose words combined, under grave circumstances, was a leader whose words combined aftention, and who was endowed with energy that could be relied on. "Be easy," said he; "I will be answerable for everything. I shall not move from here until the faur o'clock procession has passed by."

Nevertheless, he signalled to Gérard to approach. "Gre your men the strictest instructions," he said to han. "Only those persons who have cards should be allowed to pass. And place your men near reference cards should be allowed to pass. And place your men nearer cachegings tell themyto hold the cord tight."

Yonder, beneath the ivy which draped the rock, the Grotto apened, with the eternal flating of its candles. From a distance it looked rather squat and misslapen, a very narrow and modest aperture for the breath of the Infinite which issued from it, turning all faces pale and bowing every head. The state of the Virgin had become a mere white spot, which seemed to move in the quiver of the atmosphere, heated by the small yellow flames. To see anything it was necessary to raise oneself; for the silver altar, the harmonium-organ divested of its housing, the heap of bouquets thrown there, the votive offerings streaking the smoky walls, were searcely distinguishable from behind the railing. And the day was lovely; never yet had a purer sky expanded above the immense crowd; the softness of the breeze in particular scemed delicious after the storm of the night, which had brought down the over-oppressive heat of the two first days.

Gérard had to fight his way with his elbows in order to repeat the orders to his men. The crowd had already begun pushing. "Two more men herel" he called. "Come, four together if necessary, and hold the rope welll"

The general impulse was instinctive and invincible; the twenty thousand persons assembled there were drawn towards the Grotte by an irresistible attraction, in which burning curiosity mingled with the thirst for mystery. All eyes converged, every mouth hand, and body was borne towards the pale glitter of the candles and the white moving speck of the marble Virgin. And, in order that the large space reserved to the sick, in front of the railings, might not be invaded by the swelling mob, it had been necessary to enclose it with a stout rope, which the bearers at intervals of two or three yards grasped with both hands. Their orders were to let nobody pass excepting the sick provided with hospital cards and the few persons to whom special authorisations had been granted. They limited themselves, therefore, to raising the cords and then letting them fall behind the chosen ones, without listening to the supplications of any of the others. In fact they even showed themselves somewhat rough, taking a certain pleasure in exercising the authority with which they were invested for a day. In truth, however, they were very much pushed about, and had to support each other and resist with all the strength of their loins to avoid being swept away.

While the benches before the Grotto and the vast reserved space were filling with sick people, handcarts, and stretchers, the crowd, the immense crowd, swayed about on the outskirts. Starting from the Place du Rosaire, it extended to the bottom of the promenade along the Gave, where the pavement throughout its entire length was black with people, so dense a human wave that all circulation was prevented. On the parapet was an interminable line of women—most of them seated, but some few standing so as to see the better—and almost all carrying silk parasols, which with holiday-like gaiety shimmered in the sunlight. The managers had wished to a keep a path open in order that the sick might be brought along; but it was ever being invaded and obstructed, so that the carts and stretchers remained on the road, submerged and lost, until a bearer freed them from the block. Nevertheless, the great tramping was that of a docile flock, an innocent, lamb-like crowd;

the excitement, which gradually increased and threw the people No accident had ever happened there, notwithstanding and all towards the light of the candles, that had to be contended and it was only the involuntary mishing, the blind rolling of one However, Baron Suire again forced his way through the throng. "Berthaud! Berthaud!" he called, "see that the defile is conducted into the unruly delirium of faith.

There are women and children stiffing." less rapidly.

"Arussaaan This time Berthaud gave a sign of impatience, "Ah, hang it! I can't be everywhere! Close the gate for a moment if it's pressore."

enter by the door on the left, and made their exit by that on the ου τρέουβρους τρο πείσεισοου έξης ξυερίη ποτε σοποίτες το It was a question of the march through the Grotto which went worse; they would all get erushed against it!" "Close the gatel" exclaimed the Baron. "But that would be with instructions only to allow the pilgrins to enter by tens. When Cerard had executed this order, and returned, he found tellow to post two men at the entrance gate of the iron railing, instant with Raymonde, who was standing on the other side of the cord, holding a bowl of milk, which she was about to carry to, a paralysed old woman; and Berthaud ordered the young As it happened Gerard was there, thoughtlessly talking for an

she made the paralysed woman drink. her errand, however, and the two men stood watching her while Berthaud jaughing and joking with Raymonde. She went off on

"I shall ask her mother to-night. I tely upon you to accom-"She is charming, and it's settled, ch?" said Berthaud. "You are, going to marry her, aren't you?

Loui Yund

be more sensible. The uncle will find you a berth before six months are over. "Why, certainly, You know what I told you. Nothing could more sensible, The uncle will find you a berth before six entered with their hearts faint with love, and it was a sight who were solely influenced by curiosity as well as to those who foreheads bound with ribbons. Admission was free; the mystery was open to all, to unbelievers as well as to the faithful, to unbelievers as well as to the faithful, to those larly mixed: there were beggars in rags beside neat bourgeois, peasants of cither sex, well dressed ladies, servants with bare hair, young girls with bare legt, and others with pomatumed hair and chose, all who passed that way. As a result classes were singuwomen, men, and children from all parts of the world, all who any crushing. For hours the same unbroken tide rolled inwas now being accomplished in a methodical manner, without to assure himself personally whether the march through the Crotto to see them, all almost equally affected by the tepid odour of the

the quiver of the atmosphere, heated by the small yellow flames. To see anything it was necessary to raise oneself; for the silver altar, the harmonium-organ divested of its housing, the heap of bouquets thrown there, the votive offerings streaking the smoky walls, were scarcely distinguishable from behind the railing. And the day was lovely; never yet had a purer sky expanded above the immense crowd; the softness of the breeze in particular scemed delicious after the storm of the night, which had brought down the over-oppressive heat of the two first days.

Gérard had to fight his way with his elbows in order to repeat

Gérard had to fight his way with his elbows in order to repeat the orders to his men. The crowd had already begun pushing. . "Two more men here!" he called. "Come, four together if necessary, and hold the rope well!"

The general impulse was instinctive and invincible; the twenty thousand persons assembled there were drawn towards the Grotto by an irresistible attraction, in which burning curiosity mingled with the thirst for mystery. All eyes converged, every mouth, hand, and body was borne towards the pale glitter of the eandles and the white moving speck of the marble Virgin. And, in order that the large space reserved to the sick, in front of the railings. might not be invaded by the swelling mob, it had been necessary to enclose it with a stout rope, which the bearers at intervals of two or three yards grasped with both hands. Their orders were to let nobody pass excepting the siek provided with hospital cards and the few persons to whom special authorisations had been granted. They limited themselves, raising the cords and then letting them fall behind the chosen ones, without listening to the supplications of any of the others. In fact they even showed themselves somewhat rough, taking a certain pleasure in exercising the authority with which they were invested for a day. In truth, however, they were very much pushed about, and had to support each other and resist with all the strength of their loins to avoid being swept away.

While the benches before the Grotto and the vast reserved space were filling with sick people, handcarts, and stretchers, the crowd, the immense crowd, swayed about on the outskirts. Starting from the Place du Rosaire, it extended to the bottom of the promenade along the Gave, where the pavement throughout its entire length was black with people, so dense a human wave that all circulation was prevented. On the parapet was an interminable line of women—most of them seated, but some few standing so as to see the better—and almost all carrying silk parasols, which with holiday-like gaicty shimmered in the sunlight. The managers had wished to a keep a path open in order that the sick might be brought along; but it was ever being invaded and obstructed, so that the carts and stretchers remained on the road, submerged and lost, until a bearer freed them from the block. Nevertheless, the great tramping was that of a docile flock, an innocent, lamb-like crowd:

Mary, we love theel" he called.

And thereupon the crowd repeated in a lower, and confused, and broken tone, "Mary, we love theel" priese rang out at full swing, and the voices of the crowd respond-The voice of the From that moment there was no stopping,

ed in a dolorous murmur.

"Mary, thou art our only hopel"

"Mary, thon art our only hope"." Pure Virgin, make us puref."

"Pare Virgin, make us purer, among the pare!"

"Powerful Virgin, save our sick!"

enervating effect of the pesistent lamentation, which increased its while the docile crowd would do the same, quivering under the to thrust a cry home with greater force, he would repeat it thrice; Often, when the priest's imagination failed him, or he wished "Powerful Virgin, save our sickl" ien und bijests, people in nightkowns beside people who were adnossed piled up by chance as they came, women men, childblankets, and linen, splashed with stains. Doileng orow Ha bark wretchedness of all the rest—a fearful collection of rags, wom-one triumed with embroidery, alone shong out among the filling dazzling whiteness, which by a last feeling of coquetry had been side the sheets. Few of these pallets were clean. Some pillows of pedding, so that only their heads and pale hands were seen outed ticks of mattresses; whilst others had been brought with their grannd. There were some lying fully dressed on the check-patternabove the others, but the inajority lay almost on a level with the vehicles, stretchers, and mattresses. Some of the invalids in little There was an indescribable block of stagnant pool of horror. afflicted sufferers bying at full length; the flagstones disappearing, from view beneath this woeful assemblage, which was like a large. to shoulder, the strong ones supporting the weak. Then, in frunt of the benefits, before the Grotto iself, were the more greenaly ever, were propped up with enshions, whilst others kept shoulder seated had been piled upon the benches. Many of them, howof horror. To begin with, those who were still able to remain The three haspitals of Lourdes had empticed their chambers was the most heartrending jumble of sufferers that one could bewith its and beneath the vast spoiless sky on that radiant day there twelve hundred patients whom the national pilgrimmae had brought jurge shace between the cords was occupied by the thousand or sight when they turned and faced the sick. The whole of the Those who defiled through it beheld an extraordinary The litanies continued, and Berthand went back towards the wax, half stifling in the heavy tabernaele air which gathered beneath the rocky vault, and lowering their eyes for fear of slipping on the grantings. Many stood there bewildered, not even bowing, examining the things around with the eovert uneasiness of indifferent folk astray amidst the redoubtable mysteries of a sanctuary. But the devout crossed themselves, threw letters, deposited eandles and bouquets, kissed the rock below the Virgin's statue, or else rubbed their chaplets, medals, and other small objects of piety against it, as the contact sufficed to bless them. And the défilé eontinued, continued without end, during days and months as it had done for years; and it seemed as if the whole world, all the miscries and sufferings of humanity, eame in turn and passed in the same hypnotic, contagious kind of round, through that rocky nook, ever in search of happiness.

And all forms of disease were there, the whole trightful procesfully attired, jumbled together in the blinding light of day.

When Berthaud had satisfied himself that everything was working well, he walked about like a mere spectator, superintending his mon. Only one matter remained to trouble him: the procession of the Blessed Sacrament, during which such frenzy burst forth that aecidents were always to be feared.

This last day seemed likely to be a very fervent one, for he already felt a tremor of exalted faith rising among the crowd. The treatment needed for miraculous cure was drawing to an end; there had been the fever of the journey, the besetting influence of the same endless repeated hymns, and the stubborn continuation of the same religious exercises; and still and ever the conversation was turned on miracles, and the mind fixed on the divine illumination of the Grotto. Many, not having slept for three nights, had reached a state of hallueination, and walked about in a rageful dream. No repose was granted them, the continual prayers were like whips lashing their souls. The appeals to the Blessed Virgin never eeased; priest followed priest in the pulpit, proclaiming the universal dolour and directing the despairing supplications of the throng, during the whole time that the sick remained before the pale, smiling, marble statue, with hands elasped and eyes raised to heaven.

At that moment the white stone pulpit against the rock on the right of the Grotto was occupied by a priest from Toulouse, whom Berthaud knew, and to whom he listened for a moment with an air of approval. He was a stout man with an unctuous diction, famous for his rhetorical successes. However, all elo-quence here consisted in displaying the strength of one's lungs in a violent delivery of the phrase or ery, which the whole erowd had to repeat; for the addresses were nothing more than so much vociferation interspersed with "Aves" and "Paters."

The priest, who had just finished the Rosary, strove to increase his stature by stretching his short legs, whilst shouting the first appeal of the litanies which he improvised, and led in his own way, according to the inspiration which possessed him.

"Mary we love theel" he called.

priest rang out at full swing, and the voices of the crowd respond-From that moment there was no stopping. The voice of the And thereupon the crowd repeated in a lower, and confused, and broken tone, "Mary, we love theel"

ed in a dolorous murmur,

"Mary, thou art our only hope!" "Mary, thou art our only hope!"

"Pure Virgin, make us purer, among the pure!"

"Pure Virgin, make us purer, among the purel"
"Powerful Virgin, save our sick!"

while the docile crowd would do the same, quivering under the to thrust a cry home with greater force, he would repeat it thrice; Often, when the priest's imagination failed him, or he wished "Powerful Virgin, save our sickl"

ren, and priests, people in nightgowns beside people who were squeezed piled up by chance as they came, women, men, childblankets, and linen, splashed with stains. And all were pushed wretchedness of all the rest-a fearful collection of rags, worn-out trinmied with embroidery, alone shone out among the filthy dazaling whiteness, which by a last feeling of coquetry had been side the sheets. Few of these pallets were clean. Some pillows of bedding, so that only their heads and pale hands were seen onted ticks of mattresses, whilst others had been brought with their ground. There were some lying fully dressed on the check-patternabove the others, but the majority lay almost on a level with the boxes not unlike colfins and matteeses. Some of the invalids in little stagnish pool of horror. There was an indescribable block of from view beneath this wooful assemblage, which was like a large, alliebed sufferers lying at full length; the flagscones disappearing. to shoulder, the strong ones supporting the weak. Then, in front of the benelies, before the Crotto itself, were the more grievously ever, were propped up with cushions, whilst others kept shoulder scated had been piled upon the benches, Many of them, how-To begin with, those who were still able to remain of horror, The three hospitals of Lourdes had emptied their chambers was the most heartrending jumple of sufferers that one could betwelve hundred patients whom the national pilgrimage had brought Grotto. Those who deflied through it beheld an extraordinary sight when they turned and faced the sick. The whole of the large space between the cords was occupied by the thousand or The litanies continued, and Berthaud went back towards the enervating effect of the pesistent lamentation, which increased its

And all forms of disease were there, the whole frightful procesfully attired, jumbled together in the blinding light of day.

sion which, twice a day, left the hospitals to wend its way through horrified Lourdes. There were the heads caten away by eczema, the foreheads crowned with roseola, and the noses and mouths which elephantiasis had transformed into shapeless snouts. Next. the dropsical ones, swollen out like leathern bottles; the rheumatic ones with twisted hands and swollen feet, like bags stuffed full of rags; and a sufferer from hydrocephalus, whose huge and weighty skull fell backwards. Then the consumptive ones with livid skins, trembling with fever, exhausted by dysentery, wasted to skeletons. Then the deformities, the contractions, the twisted trunks, the twisted arms, the necks all awry; all the poor broken, pounded creatures, motionless in their tragic, marionette-like postures. Then the poor rachitie girls displaying their waxen complexions and slender neeks eaten into by sorcs; the yellow-faced, besotted-looking women in the painful stupor which falls on unfortunate creatures devoured by cancer; and the others who turned pale, and dared not move, fearing as they did the shock of the tumours whose weighty pain was stilling them. On the benches sat bewildered deaf women, who heard nothing, but sang on all the same, and blind ones with heads creet, who remained for hours turned towards the statue of the Virgin which they could not see. And there was also the woman stricken with imbecility, whose nose was eaten away, and who laughed with a terrifying laugh, displaying the black, empty cavern of her mouth; and then the epileptic woman whom a recent attack had left as pale as death. with froth still at the corners of her lips.

But sickness and suffering were no longer of consequence, since they were all there, seated or lying down, with their eyes upon the Grotto. The poor, fleshless, earthy-looking faces became transfigured, and began to glow with hope. Anchylosed hands were joined, heavy eyelids found the strength to rise, exhausted voices revived as the priest shouted the appeals. At first there was nothing but indistinct stuttering, similar to slight puffs of an rising here and there above the multitude. Then the ery ascended and spread through the crowd itself from one to the other end of the immense square.

. "Mary, conceived without sin, pray for us!" cried the priest in his thundering voice.

And the sick and the pilgrims repeated louder and louder:

"Mary, conceived without sin, pray for us!"

Then the flow of the litary set in, and continued with increasing

"Most pure Mother, most chaste Mother, thy children are at thy feet!"

"Most pure Mother, most chaste Mother, thy children are at Queen of the Angels, say but a word, and our siek shall be healed!"

"Queen of the Angels, say but a word, and our sick shall be healed!"

quaint her with his reflections. him, seated on a camp stool, and he liked to talk to her, and-ac-For instance, he had obtained permission to keep his wife near way of thinking. Only, like a poor, resigned man just a little weary - of heing always put off, he sometimes allowed himself diversions. without the firmness of his faith being in the least shaken by his at least by seniority. This merely needed patience on his part her, of touching her, and of obtaining his circe, if not by selection, there he had nursed this one hope of being some day noticed by them. I thowever, for the seven years that he had been coming should be as near as possible, under the yery eyes of the Virgin, it seemed to him that it was of paramount importance that he place like an old habitue who know the cosy corners. who had asked to be brought there early, wishing to choose his In the second row of sufferers, near the pulpit, was M. Sabathier,

"Raise me a little, my dear," said he. "I am slipping. I am very uncomfortable."

abou his mattress, with his back leaning against a tilted chair. Attired in trousers and a coarse woollen jacket, he was sitting of everything, and who was tring upon a neighbouring mattress, "Yes, yes," he answered; and then began to take an interest in Brother Isidore, whom they had succeeded in bringing in spite Are you better?" asked his wife, when she had raised him.

mith a sheet drawn up to his chin, and nothing protruding but

"And the poor man," said M. Sabathier. "It's very imprudent, face, with its weary features, the face of a woman of two-and-thirty faded before her time, wore an expression of unlimited less, did not occupy more room there than a child. And her long seated herself at the end of a bench and, very quiet and motiondoubtless shipped under the rones without being noticed. devotions on perceiving Madame Maze, who had just glided into the reserved space—so slender and unobtrusive, that she had He took up his chaplet again, but once more broke off from his but the Blessed Virgin is so powerful when she chooses!

some talk about her with another lady who knows her. Her husband is a connecteful traveller. He leaves her for six months at a time, and goes about with other people. Ohl he's a very gay fellow, it seems—very nice, and he doesn't let her want for money; prays. You came across ner tins morning. "And, besides, I had "Yes, yes," replied Madame Sabathier. "And, besides, I had of the chin, "it's for the conversion of her husband that this hady "And so," resumed M. Sabathier in a low voice, again addressing his wife after attracting her attention by a slight movement sadness, infinite abandonments

sion which, twice a day, left the hospitals to wend its way through horrified Lourdes. There were the heads eaten away by eczema, the foreheads erowned with roseola, and the noses and mouths which elephantiasis had transformed into shapeless snouts. Next, the dropsical ones, swollen out like leathern bottles; the rheumatic ones with twisted hands and swollen feet, like bags stuffed full of rags; and a sufferer from hydroecphalus, whose huge and weighty' skull fell backwards. Then the consumptive ones with livid skins, trembling with fever, exhausted by dysentery, wasted to skeletons. Then the deformities, the contractions, the twisted trunks, the twisted arms, the neeks all awry; all the poor broken, pounded creatures, motionless in their tragie, marionette-like posturcs. Then the poor rachitie girls displaying their waxen complexions and slender neeks eaten into by sores; the yellow-faced, besotted-looking women in the painful stupor which falls on unfortunate ereatures devoured by caneer; and the others who turned pale, and dared not move, fearing as they did the shock of the tumours whose weighty pain was stifling them. On the benches sat bewildered deaf women, who heard nothing, but sang on all the same, and blind ones with heads erect, who remained for hours turned towards the statue of the Virgin which they could not sec. And there was also the woman stricken with imbecility, whose nose was eaten away, and who laughed with a terrifying laugh, displaying the black, empty cavern of her mouth; and then the epileptie woman whom a recent attack had left as pale as death, with froth still at the eorners of her lips.

But siekness and suffering were no longer of consequence, since they were all there, seated or lying down, with their cyes upon the Grotto. The poor, fleshless, earthy-looking faces became transfigured, and began to glow with hope. Anchylosed hands were joined, heavy eyelids found the strength to rise, exhausted voices revived as the priest shouted the appeals. At first there was nothing but indistinet stuttering, similar to slight puffs of air rising here and there above the multitude. Then the cry ascended and spread through the erowd itself from one to the other end of the immense square.

"Mary, conceived without sin, pray for usl" eried the priest in his thundering voice.

And the sick and the pilgrims repeated louder and louder:

"Mary, eonecived without sin, pray for us!"

Then the flow of the litany set in, and continued with increasing speed:

"Most pure Mother, most chaste Mother, thy ehildren are at thy feet!'

"Most pure Mother, most chaste Mother, thy children are at

"Queen of the Angels, say but a word, and our sick shall be healed!"

"Queen of the Angels, say but a word, and our sick shall be him, seated on a camp stool, and he liked to talk to her, and-ac-For instance, he had obtained permission to keep his wife near way of thinking. Only, like a poor, resigned man just a little weary of heing always put off, he sometimes allowed himself diversions. without the firmness of his faith being in the least shaken by his at least by seniority. This merely needed patience on his part her, of touching her, and of obtaining his cure, if not by selection, as though she required to see her faithful in order not to forget them. However, for the seven years that he had been coming there he had nutsed this one hope of being some day noticed by should be as near as possible, under the very eyes of the Virgin, it seemed to him that it was of paramount importance that he place like an old habitue who know the cosy corners. Moreover, who had asked to he brought there early, wishing to choose his In the second row of sufferers, near the pulpit, was M. Sabathier, quaint her with his restections." Raise me a little, my dear," said he. "I am slipping. I am with a sheet drawn up to his chin, and nothing protruding but his wasted hands, which lay clasped upon the blanket. "Ahl the poor man," said M. Sabathier. "It's very imprudent, "the poor man," said M. Sabathier. in Brother Isidore, whom they had succeeded in bringing in spite of everything, and who was lying upon a neighbouring unattress, upon his mattress, with his back leaning against a tilted chair.

Attired in trousers and a coarse woollen jacket, he was sitting very uncounfortable."

"Are you better?" asked his wife, when she had raised him.
"Yes, yes," he answered, and then began to take an interest but the Blessed Virgin is so powerful when she chooses!"

sadness, infinite abandonment. face, with its weary features, the face of a woman of two-and-thirty faded before her time, wore an expression of unlimited less, did not occupy more room there than a child. And her long seated herself at the end of a bench and, very quiet and motiondoubtless slipped under the ropes without being noticed. She had the reserved space—so slender and unobtrusive, that she had devotions on perceiving Madame Maze, who had just glided into He took up his chaplet again, but once more broke off from his

at a time, and goes about with other people. Ohl he's a very gay "Yes, ves," replied Madame Sabathier. "And, besides, I had "Yes, ves," replied Madame Sabathier. "And, besides, I had some talk about her with another lady who knows her. Her harveller. He leaves her for six months husband is a commercial traveller. He leaves her for six months You came across her this morning in a shop, didn't you?" of the chin, "it's for the conversion of her husband that this lady sing his wife after attracting her attention by a slight movement "And so," resumed M. Sahathier in a low voice, again addresfellow, it seems-very nice, and he doesn't let her want for money;

only she adores him, she cannot accustom herself to his neglect, and comes to pray the Blessed Virgin to give him back to her. At this moment, it appears, he is close by, at Luchon, with two ladies—two sisters."

M. Sabathier signed to his wife to stop. He was now looking at the Grotto, again becoming a man of intellect, a professor whom questions of art had formerly impassioned. "You see, my dear," he said, "they have spoilt the Grotto by endeavouring to make it too beautiful. I am certain it looked much better in its original wildness. It has lost its characteristic features—and what a frightful shop they have stuck there, on the left!"

However, he now experienced sudden remorse for his thoughtlessness. Whilst he was chatting away, might not the Blessed Virgin be noticing one of his neighbours, more fervent, more sedate than himself? Feeling anxious on the point, he reverted to his customary modesty and patience, and with dull, expressionless eyes again began waiting for the good pleasure of Heaven.

Moreover, the sound of a fresh voice helped to bring him back to this annihilation, in which nothing was left of the cultured reasoner that he had formerly been. It was another preacher who reasoner that he had formerly been. It was another preacher who had just entered the pulpit, a Capuchin this time, whose guttural call, persistently repeated, sent a tremor through the crowd.

"Holy Virgin of virgins, be blessed!"
"Holy Virgin of virgins, be blessed!"

"Holy Virgin of virgins, turn not thy face from thy children!"
"Holy Virgin of virgins, turn not thy face from thy children!"
"Holy Virgin of virging broathe upon our cores and our core

"Holy Virgin of virgins, breathe upon our sores, and our sores hall heal!"

snan nean

"Holy Virgin of virgins, breathe upon our sores, and our sores thall heall"

At the end of the first bench, skirting the central path, which was becoming erowded, the Vigneron family had succeeded in finding room for themselves. They were all there: little Gustave, scated in a sinking posture, with his erutch between his legs; his mother, beside him, following the prayers like a punctilious bourgeoise; his aunt, Madame Chaise, on the other side, so inconvenienced by the crowd that she was stifling; and M. Vigneron, who remained silent and, for a moment, had been examining Madame Chaise attentively.

"What is the matter with you, my dear?" he inquired. "Do

yoù-fecl unwell?"

She was breathing with difficulty. "Well, I don't know," she answered; "but I can't feel my limbs, and my breath fails me."

At that very moment the thought had occurred to him.

At that very moment the thought had occurred to him that all the agitation, fever, and scramble of a pilgrimage could not be very good for heart disease. Of course he did not desire anybody's death, he had never asked the Blessed Virgin for any such thing. If his prayer for advancement had already been to whom had come the same involuntary thought. keen that he could not help exchanging a glance with his wife, fore the young. Nevertheless, his hope unconsciously became so of Cod, which generally requires that the aged should go off befortune to Custave, he would only have to bow before the will in the same way, if Madame Chaise should die first, leaving her be because Heaven had already ordained the latter's death, And, granted through the sudden death of his chief, it must certainly

One of our rehappen to have a glass of water, mademoiselle? your annt." And then, as Raymonde passed, he asked: "Do you "Gustave, draw back," he exclaimed; "you are inconveniencing latives here is losing consciousness."

But Madanne Chaise refused the offer with a gesture. She was thonghe this time that I should stiffe!" nothing, thank you," she gasped. "There, I'm better-still, I really getting better, recovering her breath with an effort. "No, I want not cure him, and that he would die. be the use of his praying? He knew that the Blessed Virgin would Dinos JedA/ and intelligence sharpened by suffering, was not praying, but Custave, who had seen and noted everything with his bright eyes enjoy in the country, cultivating llowers. On the other land, little with a respectable fortune which in later years they would go and a pleasant old age, deservedly gained by twenty years of honesty. man and wife, houest folk both of them, reverted to the covert prayer for happiness that they had come to offer up at Lourdess face. She again joined her hands, and begged the Blessed Virgin to save her from other attacks and cure her; while the Vignerous, Her fright left her frembling, with haggard eyes in her pale.

kneeling near the sufferer, finished offerns up a fervent prayer. and maryellons elegance, were standing by, while Abbé Judame, lusband in a frock-coat, and the sister in a black gown of simple of coffin quilted with white silk, in which she was being afficed in a pink dressing-gown trimined with Valenciennes lace. The and he marvelled at the luxury about the young woman, that sort came late, had been deposited in the crowded central pathway, However, M. Vigneron could not remain long without busying hinself about his neighbours. Madame Dienlafay, who had tioning him. "Well, Mousieur le Curé, does not that poor young wonnin feel a little better?" on the bench beside him; and he then took the liberty of ques-When the priest had risen, M. Vigneron made him a little room extenordinary gence by curing my poor lost eyes, that I bened to obtain another favour from her. However, I will not Two years ago the Blessed Virgin showed me such was full of so much hope! It was I who persuaded the family Abbe Indaine made a gesture of infinite sadness;

We still have until tomorrow."

M. Vigneron again looked towards Madame Dieulafay and examined her poor face, still of a perfect oval and with admirable eyes; but now it was expresssionless, with ashen hue, similar to a mask of death, amidst the lace. "It's really very sad," he murmured.

"And if you had seen her last summer!" resumed the priest. "They have their country seat at Saligny, my parish, and I often dined with them. I cannot help feeling sad when I look at her elder sister, Madame Jousseur, that lady in black who stands there, for she bears a strong resemblance to her; and the poor sufferer was even prettier, one of the beauties of Paris. And now compare them together—observe that brilliancy, that sovereign grace, beside that poor, pitful creature—it oppresses one's heart—ahl what a frightful lesson!"

He became silent for an instant. Saintly man that he was naturally, altogether devoid of passions, with no keen intelligence to disturb him in his faith, he displayed a naïve admiration for beauty, wealth, and power, which he had never envied. Nevertheless, he ventured to express a doubt, a scruple, which troubled his usual serenity. "For my part, I should have liked her to come here with more simplicity, without all that surrounding of luxury, because the Blessed Virgin prefers the humble—But I understand very well that there are certain social exigencies. And, then, her husband and sister love her so! Remember that he has forsaken his business and she her pleasures in order to come here with her; and so overcome are they at the idea of losing her that their eyes are never dry, they always have that bewildered look which you can notice. So they must be excused for trying to procure her the comfort of looking beautiful until the last hour."

M. Vigneron nodded his head approvingly. Ah! it was certainly not the wealthy who had the most luck at the Grottol Scrvants, country folk, poor beggars were cured, while ladies returned home with their ailments unrelieved, notwithstanding their gifts and the big candles they had burnt. And, in spite of himself, Vigneron then looked at Madame Chaise, who, having recovered from her attack, was now reposing with a comfortable air.

But a tremor passed through the crowd and Abbé Judainc spoke again: "Here is Father Massias coming towards the pulpit.

He is a saint; listen to him."

They knew him, and were aware that he could never appear without every soul being stirred by sudden hope, for it was reported that the miracles were often brought to pass by his great fervour. His voice, full of tenderness and strength, was said to be appreciated by the Virgin.

All heads were therefore uplifted and the emotion yet further increased when Father Fourcade was seen coming to the foot of the pulpit, leaning on the shoulder of his well-beloved brother, the preferred of-all; and he stayed there, so that he also might the crowd made him happy, however, he foresaw prodigies and lazzling cures which would redound to the glory of Mary and o remain thus standing and smiling. The increasing exaltation toat him. His gouty foot had been paining him more acutely ince the morning, so that it required great courage on his part

He seemed very tall, thin, and pale, with an ascetic face; Unving entered the pulpit, Father Massias did not at once is large, elequent mouth protruded passionately. dongated more by his discoloured beard. His eyes sparkled and repeated; "Lord, save us, for we perish!" lever, which increased minute by minute, the transported crowd "Lord, save us, for we perish!" he suddenly cried; and in a cry, as if he had torn it from his glowing heart: "Lord, if it be Then he opened his arms and again launched forth his flaming Thy will, Thou canst heal me!"

"Lord, I am not worthy that Thou shouldst enter under my "Lord, if it be Thy will, Thou canst heal me!"

roof, but only say the word, and I shall be healed!"

"Lord, I am not worthy that Thou shouldst enter under my roof, but only say the word, and I shall be healed!"

The Blessed Virgin must be quick indeed if she icht in him. and, drawn together by so much suffering, the servant had familiarly confided to the bourgeoise how anxious she felt about her profiler; for she could plainly see that he had very little breath whisper with Madame Sabathier, near whom she had at last seated hegiself. They had formed an acquaintance at the Hospital; Marthe, Brother Isidore's sister, had now begun to talk in a

been able to bring him alive as far as the Crotto. desired to save him.

ther to Paris, five years ago already. Ahl what a lot of trouble The elder ones took over the property, and, for my part, I preferred going out to service. Yes, it was a lady who took me with priest, who ended by placing him among the Christian Brothers. always been delicate, and that was why he remained with our at home, at Saint-Jacut, near Vannes. He, big as he was, has denly retinned in her; and with her negati; "We were fourteen came faintly from her lips. Then a flood of past memories sudnot weep; but her heart was so swollen that her infrequent words in her resignation, poor, simple ereature that she was, she did cach of Father Massias's appeals. "You are quite right, my girl," replied Madame Sabathier, looking the while at her husband, who was devoutly repeating been on a mission, had brought a bad sickness back with him. that Isidore, who had returned from a hot climate where he had fuour puy. continued Marthe, "there I learned last month

And, when I ran to see him, he told me he should die if he did not leave for Lourdes, but that he couldn't make the journey, because he had nobody to accompany him. Then, as I had eighty francs saved up, I gave up my place, and we set out together. You see, madame, if I am so fond of him, it's because when I was little he used to bring me gooseberries from the parsonage, whereas all the others beat me."

She relapsed into silence for a moment, her countenance swollen by grief, and her poor eyes so scorched by watching that no tears could come from them. Then she began to stutter disjointed words: "Look at him, madame. It fills one with pity. Ah, my God! his poor cheeks, his poor chin, his poor face--"

It was, in fact, a lamentable spectacle. Madame Sabathier's heart was quite upset when she observed Brother Isidore so yellow, cadaverous, steeped in a cold sweat of agony. Above the sheet he still only showed his clasped hands and his face encircled with long scanty hair; but if those wax-like hands seemed lifeless, if there was not a feature of that long-suffering face that stirred, its eyes were still alive, inextinguishable eyes of love, whose flame sufficed to illumine the whole of his expiring visage—the visage of a Christ upon the cross. And never had the contrast been so clearly marked between his low forehead and unintelligent, loutish, peasant air, and the divine splendour which came from his poor human mask, ravaged and sanctified by sufferings, sublime at this last hour in the passionate radiance of his faith. His flesh had melted as it were; he was no longer a breath, nothing but a look, a light.

Since he had been set down there his eyes had not strayed from the statue of the Virgin. Nothing else existed around him. He did not see the enormous multitude, he did not even hear the wild cries of the priests, the incessant cries which shook this quivering crowd. His eyes alone remained to him, his eyes burning with infinite tenderness, and they were fixed upon the Virgin, never more to turn from her. They drank her in, even unto death, they made a last effort of will to disappear, die out in her. For an instant, however, his mouth half opened and his drawn visage relaxed as an expression of eelestial beatitude came over it. Then nothing more stirred, his eyes remained wide open, still obstinately fixed upon the white statue.

A few seconds clapsed. Marthe had felt a cold breath, chilling the roots of her hair. "I say, madame, look!" she stammered. Madame Sabathier, who felt anxious, pretended that she did not understand. "What is it, my girl?"

"My brother! Look! He no longer moves. He opened his mouth and has not stirred sinee." Then they both shuddered, feeling certain he was dead. He had, indeed, just passed away, withou a rattle, without a breath, as if life had escaped in his glance through his large, loving eyes, ravenous with passion. He had

as though with inestable delight. sweet; and he still continued to gaze upon her with his dead eyes, shall soon know them.

Virgin.

օուցրլե ուօաշաք՝

was already spreading. to keep her quiet, that of a sob: "Jesus, son of David, I am perishing, save mel" torth with the strength of terrible despair, with a rending like But the cry of Father Massias rose into a still higher key, burst if it would not listen to her prayer and give her back her husband. happened, suddenly felt a taste for death, and resolved that she would implore Heaven to suppress her also, in unobtrusive fashion, wound in his side, to die there, beneath the smiling gaze of the Blessed Virgin? And Madame Maze, who also knew what had missionary who had returned from a deadly climate, with a mortal voice recited the prayers for the dead. Was he not a Saint, that contemplation of their own dear invalid; whilst Abbé Judaine, informed by M. Vigneron, knelt down, and in a low, agitated tay's ear, and then they had both reverted to the heart-rending throughout the evening. Madame Jousseur, for her part, had simply turned round and whispered a word or two in M. Dieulahome from the Ministry, and which sufficed to occupy them all, incidents which in Paris the father sometimes related on returning as though in presence of some street aecident, one of those petty power which sent death when life was asked for. The Vignerons, who were very much interested, leaned forward, and whispered not help turning pale at the thought of the mysterious, almighty returned to his prayers without any rebellion, though he could and on being answered by a prolonged affirmative nod, he had Sabathier, quite scared, had made a questioning sign to his wife, Only a few persons among those around knew the truth. M.

to leave his eyes wide open, steeped in unbounded ecstasy. "Ahl it's finished, it's quite finished, madaine!" she stuttered. Virgin with invincible obstinacy. He was dead, and Marthe had linger. But each time they reopened, and again looked at the he observed, she endeavoured to close the eyes with a trembling Marthe had already risen, and, leaning forward, so as not to alive, ardently appealing to the divine compassion of the Blessed ously, and everybody would think that his flaming eyes were still seem any more dead now than he had seemed ten minutes previeffect. The best plan would be to leave it there, pending a favthe prayers, without incurring the risk of creating a disastrous was impossible to earry off the corpse amidst such a mob, during her cheeks; while Madanie Sabathier caught hold of her hand Two tears then burst from her heavy evelids and ran down

The poor fellow seandalised no one, he did not

There had been whisperings, and uncasiness ing. But what course could be adopted? It

"Try to close his eyes," murmured Madaine Sabathier. "We expired gazing upon the Virgin, and nothing could have been so

And the crowd sobbed after him in unison: "Jesus, son of David, I am perishing, save me!"

Then, in quick succession, and in higher and higher keys, the appeals went on proclaiming the intolerable misery of the world:
"Legge con of Dovid take nity on Thy sick children!"

"Jesus, son of David, take pity on Thy sick children!"
"Jesus, son of David, take pity on Thy sick children!"
"Jesus, son of David, come, heal them, that they may live!"
"Jesus, son of David, come, heal them, that they may live!"

It was delirium. At the foot of the pulpit Father Fourcade, succumbing to the extraordinary passion which overflowed from all hearts, had likewise raised his arms, and was shouting the appeals in his thundering voice as though to compel the intervention of Heaven. And the exaltation was still increasing beneath this blast of desire, whose powerful breath bowed every-head in turn, spreading even to the young women who, in a spirit of mere curiosity, sat watching the scene from the parapet of the Gave; for these also turned pale under their sunshades.

Miserable humanity was clamouring from the depths of its abyss of suffering, and the clamour swept along, sending a shudder down every spine, for one and all were plunged in agony, refusing to dic, longing to compel God to grant them eternal life. life, life! that was what all those unfortunates, who had come from so far, amid so many obstacles, wanted-that was the one boon they asked for, in their wild desire to live it over again, to live it always! O Lord, whatever our misery, whatever the torment of our life may be, cure us, grant that we may begin to live again and suffer once more what we have suffered already. However unhappy we may be, to be is what we wish. It is not Heaven that we ask Thee for, it is earth; and grant that we may leave it at the latest possible moment,-never leave it, indeed, if such be Thy good pleasure. And even when we no longer implore a physical cure, but a moral favour, it is still happiness that we ask Thee for; happiness, the thirst for which alone consumes us. O Lord, grant that we may be happy and healthy; let us live, ay, let us live for ever!

This wild cry, the ery of man's furious desire for life, came in broken accents, mingled with tears, from every breast.

"O Lord, son of David, heal our sick!"
"O Lord, son of David, heal our sick!"

Berthaud had twice been obliged to dash forward to prevent the cords from giving way under the unconscious pressure of the crowd. Baron Suire, in despair, kept on making signs, begging some one to come to his assistance; for the Grotto was now invaded, and the march past had become the mere trampling of a flock rushing to its passion. In vain did Gérard again leave Raymonde and post himself at the entrance-gate of the iron railing, so as to carry out the orders, which were to admit the pilgrims by tens. He was hustled and swept aside, while with inflamed lips had polished. It was faith run wild, the great between the flaring candles, throwing bouquets and letters to the Virgin and kissing the rock, which the pressure of millions of teverish excitement everybody rushed in, passing like a torrent

"leabruou he gazes on Our Lady of Lourdes!" look at that one; see how he is praying with his whole heart, eyes were still fixed on the statue of the Virgin, that she crossed herself, and, overcome by devout admiration, murmured: "Ohl impressed by the pallid face of Brother Isidore, whose large dilated lying on the stretchers before them. One of them was so greatly bearing onward, raise loud exclamations at sight of the sufferers power that nothing henceforth could stop.
And now, whilst Cerard stood there, hennied in against the tron railing, he heard two countrywomen, whom the advance was certainly cure him, he is so beautifull! The other peasant woman thereupon replied: "Ohl she will could behold him without feeling edified. touclied every lieart, No one in that endless, streaming throng Indeed, as the dead man lay there, his eyes still fixedly staring whilst he continued his prayer of love and faith, his appearance

Ш

YIVITE, 2 CORE

sorts of attentions. Catholic press still resounded, he had become one of the glories of Lourdes, was given the first place, and honoured with all Ir was good Abbe Judaine who was to carry the Blessed Saerament in the four o'clock procession. Since the Blessed Virgin had cured him of a disease of the eyes, a miraele with which the don't attenipt to pass out by way of the Rosary, you would of it. Fortunately help came to him in the person of Berthaud. "Monsieur le Curé," explained the Superintendent of the Bearers. At half-past three he rose, wishing to leave the Crotto, but the extraordinary concourse of people quite frightened him, and he issued he would be late if he did not succeed in gelting out part good heavens! how shall we manage to pass with the proand opened a path for the priest, who overwhelmed him with thanks. "You are too kind, it's my fault; I had forgotten myself. never arrive in time. The best course is to ascend by the winding paths—and contel follow me; I will go before you.

By means of his elbows, he thereupon parted the dense throng and cession presently?"

This procession was Berthaud's remaining anxiety. Even on ordinary days it provoked wild excitement, which forced him to take special measures; and what would now happen, as it wended its way through this dense multitude of thirty thousand persons, consumed by such a fever of faith, already on the verge of divine frenzy? Accordingly, in a sensible way he took advantage of this opportunity to give Abbé Judaine the best advice.

"Ahl Monsieur le Curé, pray impress upon your colleagues of the clergy that they must not leave any space between their ranks; they should come on slowly, one close behind the other. And, above all, the banners should be firmly grasped, so that they may not be overthrown. As for yourself, Monsieur le Guré, see that the canopy-bearers are strong, tighten the cloth around the monstrance, and don't be afraid to earry it in both hands with all your strength."

A little frightened by this advice, the priest went on expressing his thanks. "Of course, of course, you are very good," said he. "Ahl monsieur, how much I am indebted to you for having helped me to escape from all those people!"

Then, free at last, he hastened towards the Basilica by the narrow serpentine path which elimbs the hill; while his companion again plunged into the mob, to return to his post of inspection.

At that same moment Pierre, who was bringing Marie to the Grotto in her little eart, encountered on the other side, that of the Place du Rosaire, the impenetrable wall formed by the crowd. The servant at the hotel had awakened him at three o'clock, so that he might go and fetch the young girl at the hospital. There seemed to be no hurry; they apparently had plenty of time to reach the Grotto before the procession. However, that immense throng, that resisting, living wall, through which he did not know how to break, began to cause him some uneasiness. He would never succeed in passing with the little car if the people did not evince some obligingness. "Come, ladies, come!" he repeated. "I beg of you! You see, it's for a patient!"

The ladies, hypnotised as they were by the spectacle of the Grotto sparkling in the distance, and standing on tiptoe so as to lose nothing of the sight, did not move, however. Besides, the clamour of the litanies was so loud at this moment that they did not even hear the young priest's entreaties,

Then Pierre began again: "Pray stand on one side, gentlemen; allow me to pass. A little room for a sick person. Come, please, listen to what I am saying!"

But the men, beside themselves, in a blind, deaf rapture, would stir no more than the women.

Marie, moreover, smiled serencly, as if ignorant of the impediments, and convinced that nothing in the world could prevent her from going to her cure. However, when Pierre had found an aperture, and begun to work his way through the moving him suffer even to nausea. the evil breath, and the old clothes, smelling of poverty, made ugliness of the features around him, the common, sweating faces, found a troubling thrill in its midst, a peculiar atmosphere that upset him. And, in spite of his affection for the humble, the threatening mob, it was as innocent as a flock of sheep; but he felt such an anxious sensation in a crowd, Irue, it was not a stop, wait, and again entreat the people. Pierre had never before threatened to submerge it. At each step it became necessary to mass, the situation became more serious. From all parts the

"Now, ladies, now, gentlemen, it's for a patient," he repeated.

"A little room, I beg of you!"

difficulty through that human ocean. and tratemal chanty behind it, as it made its way with so much cured. And thus the little car left, as it were, a feeling of wonder placed her hope. She beheld Heaven, she would assuredly be with her clear eyes open to the spheres beyond, where she had surprise, struck as they were by the ecstasy in which they saw her, Blessed Virgin be merciful to her! Others, however, expressed Was it not cruel to be infirm at her age? Might the poor child! of compassion and admiration were heard on all sides. Ah, the thin, suffering face, shining out amidet a halo of fair hair. Words not dare to get angry, for pity penetrated them at sight of that it reappeared near the piscinas. Tender sympathy had at length been awakened for this sick girl, so wasted by suffering, but still so heautiful. When people had been compelled to give way before the priest's stubborn pushing, they turned round, but did before the priest's stubborn pushing, they turned round, but did few yards of ground. At one moment you might have thought it swamped, for no sign of it could be detected. Then, however, to advance by fits and starts, taking long minutes to get over a Bulleted about in this vast ocean, the little vehicle continued him without a pause. the midst of an ocean, whose waves he had heard heaving around had just accomplished, Pierre reflected what a prodigious con-course of people there was; it had seemed to him as if he were in every minute. And, quite exhausted by the painful journey he he halted, facing the Grotto on the left side. You could no longer move in this reserved space, where the crowd seemed to increase manner, and at last place her within the reserved space, where the young priest was able to drag Marie along in a fairly easy were to hold at intervals of a couple of yards. From that moment had ordered them to keep clear by means of cords, which they a path for the passage of the procession-a path which Berthaud when some of the stretcher-bearers came to his aid by torming Pierre, however, was in despair and at the end of his strength,

Since leaving the Hospital Marie had not opened her lips. He now realised, however, that she wished to speak to him, and accordingly bent over her. "And my father," she inquired, "i he here? Hasn't he returned from his excursion?"

Pierre had to answer that M. de Guersaint had not returned, and that he had doubtless been delayed against his will.

thereupon she merely added with a smile. "Ah, poor father! won't he be pleased when he finds me cured!"

Picre looked at her with tender admiration. He did not remember having ever seen her looking so adorable since the slow wasting of siekness had begun. Her hair, which alone disease had respected, clothed her in gold. Her thin, delicate face had assumed a dreamy expression, her eyes wandering away to the haunting thought of her sufferings, her features motionless, as if she had fallen asleep in a fixed thought until the expected shock of happiness should waken her. She was absent from herself, ready, however, to return to consciousness whenever God might will it. And, indeed, this delicious infantile creature, this little girl of three-andtwenty, still a child as when an accident had struck her, preventing her from becoming a woman, was at last ready to receive the visit of the angel, the miraculous shock which would draw her out of her torpor and set her upright once more. Her morning ecstasy continued; she had clasped her hands, and a leap of her whole heing had ravished her from earth as soon as she had perceived the image of the Blessed Virgin yonder. And now she prayed and

It was an hour of great mental trouble for Pierre. He felt that the drama of his priestly life was about to be enacted, and that if he did not recover faith in this crisis, it would never return to him. And he was without bad thoughts, without resistance, hoping with fervour, he also, that they might both be healed! Oh! that he might be convinced by her cure, that he might believe like her, that they might be saved together! He wished to pray, ardently, as she herself did. But in spite of himself he was preoecupied by the crowd, that limitless crowd, among which he found it so difficult to drown himself, disappear, become nothing more than a leaf amidst the leaves. He could not prevent himself from analysing and judging it. He knew that for four days past it had been undergoing all the training of suggestion; there had been the fever of the long journey, the excitement of the new landscapes, the days spent before the splendour of the Grotto, the sleepless nights, and all the exasperating suffering, ravenous for illusion. Then, again, there had been the all-besetting prayers, those Anch, again, there had been the all-besetting prayers, those hymns, those litanies which agitated it without a pause. Another priest had followed Father Massias in the pulpit, a little, thin and dark Abbé, whom Pierre heard hurling appeals to the Virgin and Jesus in a lashing voice which resounded like a whip. Father Massias and Father Fourcade had remained at the foot of the pulpit, and were now directing the cries of the crowd, whose lamentations rose in louder and louder tones beneath the limpid hour when the violence done to Heaven at last produced the The general exaltation had yet increased; it was the .thyilnus

miracles.

would at times exclaim: "Ah, she's cured, that one; she's lucky, Anotherl Yet anotherl However, a piteous voice was cured, were exchanged whenever a delitious patient cried out that she the quiet affirmations, the expressions of absolute certainty which heated imaginations, given what they expected from the Blessed Virgin, And you should have heated the tales that went about, the usual thing, quite conmonplace, such was its abundance. The most incredible stories seemed quite sinple to those overishing anyone. Miraele-working became the actual state of nature, certisted that an amputated leg was growing again without astondaily occurrence. Surprise was no longer possible; you might have tive had revived What, a consumptive? Certainly; that was a pointed them out. Another woman had been cured! Another! Yet amother! A deaf person had heard, a mute had spoken, a consumpwonderful. Some eyes seemed to behold them, and feverish voices They were all on the look-out for prodigies, they avaited them with the certainty that they would take place, innumerable and shove the swaying heads, wrung loud applause from the faithful. holding his erutch in the air; and this erutch, waving like a flag All at once a paralytic rose up and walked towards the Crotto, little, notwithstanding his efforts to the contrary, he returned to and invincible, began afresh in the depths of his brain. Little by his will and intelligence, the stubborn work of thought, incessant the old man in him, that he had annihilated himself along with-But just at that second, when he hoped that he had killed inder the milistone, who trouble not about the power that erushes able other grains, one of the jumblest among the humble ones would become nothing more than a grain of sand among innumerodly at the statue of the Virgin, until he became quite giddy, and imagined that the figure moved. Why should he not returned to a state of childhood like the others, since happiness lay in ignorance and falsehood? Contagion would surely end by acting, he ance and falsehood? this appeal with all his charity, chasped his hands, and gazed fixwithin hin, and allowed the cry of supplication to earry him away, "Lord, heat our sick!" He repeated impossible." For a moment he thought the spirit of inquiry dead no longer desire to understand, that I may accept the unreal and he prayed, "grant that my reason may be annihilated, that I may fishion, with the open smiles of children. Accordingly he tried to absorb himself in his thoughts and listen to nothing. "O Godl" by the extravagant things he heard people say in such a placid sed everything he could have innagined; and he was exasperated Alteady at the Verification Office, Pierre had suffered from this erequility of the folk appoint whom he jived. But here it surpas-"isi ons his inquiries, doubted, and sought the truth. What was the unknown force thrown off by this crowd, the vital fluid powerful enough to work the few cures that really occurred? There was here a phenomenon that no physiologist had yet studied. Ought one to believe that a multitude became a single being, as it were able to increase the power of auto-suggestion tenfold upon itself? Might one admit that, under certain circumstances of extreme exaltation, a multitude became an agent of sovereign will compelling the obedience of matter? That would have explained how sudden cure fell at times upon the most sincerely excited of the throng. The breaths of all of them united in one breath, and the power that acted was a power of consolation, hope, and life.

This thought, the outcome of his human charity, filled Pierre with emotion. For another moment he was able to regain possession of himself, and prayed for the cure of all, deeply touched by the belief that he himself might in some degree contribute towards the cure of Marie. But all at once, without knowing what transition of ideas led to it, a recollection returned to him of the medical consultation which he had insisted upon prior to the young girl's departure for Lourdes. The scene rose before him with extraordinary clearness and precision; he saw the room with its grey, blue-flowered wallpaper, and he heard the three doctors discuss and decide. The two who had given certificates diagnosticating paralysis of the marrow spoke discreetly, slowly, like esteemed, well-known, perfectly honourable practitioners; but Pierre still heard the warm, vivacious voice of his cousin Beauclair, the third doctor, a young man of vast and daring intelligence, who was treated coldly by his colleagues as being of an adventurous turn of mind. And at this supreme moment Pierre was surprised to find in his memory things which he did not know were there; but it was only an instance of that singular phenomenon by which it sometimes happens that words searce listened to, words but imperfectly heard, words stored away in the brain almost in spite of self, will awaken, burst forth, and impose themselves on the mind after they have long been forgotten. And thus it now seemed to him that the very approach of the miracle was bringing him a vision of the conditions under which-according to Beauclair's predictions-the miracle would be accomplished.

In vain did Pierre endeavour to drive away this recollection by praying with an increase of fervour. The scene again appeared to him, and the old words rang out, filling his ears like a trumpet-blast. He was now again in the dining-room, where Beauclair and he had shut themselves up after the departure of the two others, and Beauclair recapitulated the history of the malady: the fall from a horse at the age of fourteen; the dislocation and displacement of the organ, with doubtless a slight laceration of the ligaments, whence the weight which the sufferer had felt, and place her on her feet again, cured, transfigured, beneath the lash the will to rise, breathe freely, and suffer no more, could alone to throw off the false notion she had formed of her complaint, to the breast in frightful fits of stilling. A sudden determination the form of a crushing, intolerable weight, which sometimes rose leaving the organ, had borno to the left, where it continued in of her face, and above all the nature of the pain she felt, which, lield, the fixity of her eyes, the absorbed, mattentive expression which he gave for this belief were the contraction of her visual ever since the first violent shock of pain; and among the reasons state of auto-suggestion, in which she had obstinately remained, into the girl's parentage, had just degun to suspect a simple believing in a tumour, and the others, the more numerous, convinced of some lesion of the marrow. He alone, after inquiring would not submit to examination, had groped in the dark, some of the numerous doctors who had attended her, and who, as she Beauclair easily explained the contrary and erroneous diagnoses due to faulty nutrition as yet imperfeetly understood. And further, consecutive nervous exhaustion, doubtless aggravated by accidents after cure, her sufferings had continued-a neuropathie state, a where she suffered, and she could not divert it, so that, even was unable to forget it, her attention remained fixed on the part but without the pain ceasing. In fact this big, nervous child, whose mind had been so grievously impressed by her accident, healing of the disorder, everything returning to its place of itself, the weakness of the legs leading to paralysis. Then, a slow

of some intense emotion.

A last time did Pierre endeavour to see and hear no more, for he felt that the irreparable ruin of all belief in the miraculous was in hint. And, in spite of his efforts, in spite of the ardour with which he began to ery. "Jesus, son of David, heal our siek!" he still heard Beauclair telling him, in his calm, in gill ash, at the moment of extreme emotion, under the decisive circumstance which would complete the loosening of the muscles. The patient would rise and walk in a wild transport of joy, her eigentennestance which would employe the loosening of the weight legs would all at once be light again, relieved of the weight which had so long made them like lead, as though this weight had melted, fallen to the ground. But above all, the weight which bore upon the lower part of the trunk, which rose, ravaged the breast, and strangled the throat, would this time depart in a prodigious soaring flight, a tempest blast bearing all the evil their flesh had so long been tortured? And Beauelair had added their Manner and and a strangled the throat, would this time depart in the breast, and strangled the throat, would this time depart in the breast, and strangled the throat, would this time depart in their flesh had so long been tortured? And Beauelair had added their Manner it. And was it not thus that, in the Middle Ages, their Mongraph and the would at last become a woman, that in that moment of supreme joy she would cease to be a child, that although of supreme joy she would cease to be a child, that although the latter by her produced dream of suffering, she seemingly worn out by her prolonged dream of suffering, she seemingly worn out by her prolonged dream of suffering, she seemingly worn out by her prolonged dream of suffering, she

LOURDES

ld all at once be restored to resplendent health, with beaming and eyes full of life.

erre looked at her, and his trouble increased still more on g her so wretched in her little cart, so distractedly imploring h, her whole being soaring towards Our Lady of Lourdes, gave life. Ah! might she be saved, at the cost even of his damnation! But she was too ill; science lied like faith; uld not believe that this child, whose limbs had been dead of many years, would indeed return to life. And, in the dered doubt into which he again relapsed, his bleeding heart ured yet more loudly, ever and ever repeating with the ous crowd: "Lord, son of David, heal our sick!—Lord, son of

, heal our sickl"

that moment a tumult arose agitating one and all. People ered, faces were turned and raised. It was the cross of the 'eloek procession, a little behind time that day, appearing eneath one of the arches of the monumental gradient-way. was such applause and such violent, instinctive pushing erthaud, waving his arms, commanded the bearers to thrust wd back by pulling strongly on the cords. Overpowered moment, the bearers had to throw themselves backward re hands; however, they ended by somewhat enlarging erved path, along which the procession was then able to " wend its way. At the head came a superb beadle, all d gold, followed by the processional cross, a tall cross like a star. Then followed the delegations of the different ges with their banners, standards of velvet and satin, ered with metal and bright silk, adorned with painted and bearing the names of towns: Versailles, Rheims, Poitiers, and Toulouse. One, which was quite white, ently rieh, displayed in red letters the inscription: "Assof Catholie Working Men's Clubs." Then came the elergy, aree hundred priests in simple cassoeks, about a hundred s, and some fifty clothed in golden chasubles, effulgent

They all carried lighted candles, and sang the "Laudate atorem" in full voices. And then the canopy appeared pomp, a canopy of purple silk, braided with gold, and y four ccclesiastics, who, it could be seen, had been rom among the most robust. Beneath it, between two sts who assisted him, was Abbé Judaine, vigorously he Blessed Sacrament with both hands, as Berthaud lended him to do; and the somewhat uneasy glances st on the encroaching crowd right and left showed how was that no injury should befall the heavy, divine was weight was already straining his wrists. When g sun fell upon him in front, the monstrance itself: another sun. Choir-boys meantime were swinging the blinding glow which gave splendour to the entire

at once commanded absolute silence, in order that one and all burning eries of faith, hope, and love that he threw forth, he all and this time he had devised another pious exercise. After the Eather Massias had returned to the pulpit a moment previously; colling waves. illame, hurrying along, and blocking the track with their everof pilgrims, a flock-like tramping of believers and sight-seers all procession; and finally, in the rear, there was a confused mass himself sobbed on one of the steps of the pulpit, raising his not letting this enthusiasm abate, resumed his cries, and again lashed the delirious crowd with them; while Father Fourcade their neighbours their health and youth. And then Father Massias, preases with both hands, if by doing so they could have given sublime, disorder which would have impelled them to open their Jesus!" Tears streamed from every eye; these supplications upset all lieates, threw the hardest into the frency of charity, into a grant that I may see, grant that I may hear, grant that I may walk!" And, all at once, the shrill voice of a little girl, light and vivacious as the notes of a flute, rose above the universal sob, vivacious as the distances: "Save the others, save the others, Lord Legicli," Time distance: "Save the others, save the others, Lord Jesus, take pity on Thy child, who is dying of love!" "Lord Jesus, sobs. "Lord Jesus, if it please Thee, Thou eanst cure me!" "Lord almighty power. And, in response, came a pitiful lamentation, hundreds of tremulous, hroken voices rising amidst a concert of speak, to implore God to grant them what they asked of His its light on high si Then Father Massias invited the siek alone to formidable; you heard desire, the immense desire for life, winging were deeply, wonderfully impressive, Their solemnity became minutes of mute prayer, in which all souls unbosomed their secrets, These sudden spells of silence falling upon the vast crowd, these might, with closed lips, speak to God in secret for a few minutes.

calls, entreaties broke, lapsing into groans. Human forms tose from pallets of suffering, trembling arms were stretched forth; elenehed hands seemingly desired to clutch at the miracle together, and all will was borne away by vertigo. The cries, when the sufferers perceived Jesus the Host, the Blessed Sacrament, shining like a sun, in the hands of Abbé Judaine, it became impossible to direct the prayers—all voices mingled untered the space reserved to the sick in front of the Crotto, ranged themselves on the right and left; and, when the canopy

But the procession had arrived, the delegations, the priests had streaming face to Heaven as though to command God to descend

Thrice did the despairon the way. "Lord Jesus, save us, for we perish!" "Lord Jesus, we worship Thee; heal us!" "Lord Jesus, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God; heal us!"

- ing, exasperated voices give vent to the supreme lamentation
- in a clamour which rushed up to Heaven; and the tears redoubled, flooding all the burning faces which desire transformed. At one moment the delirium became so great, the instinctive leap towards the Blessed Sacrament seemed so irresistable, that Berthaud placed the bearers who were there in a chain about it. This was the extreme protective manœuvre, a hedge of bearers drawn up on either side of the canopy, each placing an arm firmly round his neighbour's neck, so as to establish a sort of living wall. Not the smallest aperture was left in it; nothing whatever could pass. Still, these human barriers staggered under the pressure of the unfortunate creatures who hungered for life, who wished to touch, to kiss Jesus; and, oscillating and recoiling, the bearers were at last thrust against the canopy they were defending, and the canopy itself began swaying among the crowd, ever in danger of being swept away like some holy bark in peril of being wrecked.

Then, at the very climax of this holy frenzy, the miracles began amidst supplications and sobs, as when the heavens open during a storm, and a thunderbolt falls on earth. A paralytic woman rose and east aside her crutches. There was a piercing yell, and another woman appeared erect on her mattress, wrapped in a white blanket as in a winding-sheet; and people said it was a half-dead consumptive who had thus been resuscitated. Then grace fell upon two others in swift succession: a blind woman suddenly perceived the Grotto in a flame; a dumb woman fell on both her knees, thanking the Blessed Virgin in a loud, clear voice. And all in a like way prostrated themselves at the feet of Our Lady of Lourdes, distracted with joy and gratitude.

But Pierre had not taken his eyes off Maric, and he was overcome with tender emotion at what he saw. The sufferer's cyes were still expressionless, but they had dilated, while her poor, pale face, with its heavy mask, was contracted as if she were suffering frightfully. She did not speak in her despair; she undoubtedly thought that she was again in the clutches of her ailment. But, all at once, when the Blessed Sacrament passed by, and she saw the star-like monstrance sparkling in the sun, a sensation of dizziness came over her. She imagined herself struck by lightning. Her eyes caught fire from the glare which flashed upon her, and at last regained their flame of life, shining out like stars. And under the influence of a wave of blood her face became animated, suffused with colour, beaming with a smile of joy and health. And suddenly, Pierre saw her rise, stand upright in her little car, staggering, stuttering, and finding in her mind only these caressing words; "Oh, my friend! Oh, my friend!"

He hurriedly drew near in order to support her. But she drove him backward with a gesture. She was regaining strength, looking so touching, so beautiful, in the little black woollen gown and slippers which she always wore: tall and slender, too, and "I am cured!" am cured!" burst from her open mouth, and flew away in a cry of sublime joy. Only, this time, it did not linger there, did not stifle her, but linal agony, an enormous weight that rose to her very throat. the life of woman, wife, and mother-within her, there came a chains that bound them; and then, while she felt the spirit of liferated her. First of all, it was her legs that were relieved of the form was quivering as it some powerful fermentation had regenewas covered with a simple piece of lace. The whole of her virgin crowned as with a halo of gold by her beautiful flaxen hair, which

She had become the sole the entire crowd was distracted by it. her ery of cure had resounded with such rapturous delight that teet, she was triumphant, she had a superb, glowing face. Then there was an extraordinary sight. The blanket lay at her

"I am cured!" am cured!" radiant and so divine, point of interest, the others saw none but her, erect, grown, so forward to see into a state of violent emotion. Applause broke out, a fury of applause, whose thunder rolled from one to the one to another, throwing the thousands of pilgrims who pressed clamations of gratitude and praise, frantic enthusiasm passed from to weep. Indeed, tears glistened again in every eye. Amidst ex-Pierre, at the violent shock his heart had received, had begun

Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour. Magnificat anima mea Dominum, My soul doth magnify the Cod has visited us, my dear brothers, my dear sisters!" said he. Massias was at last able to make himself heard from the pulpit. However, Father Fourcade began waving his arms, and Father other end of the valley.

giving the Benediction. The canopy was awaiting him outside the railings, surrounded by priests in surplices and chasubles, all a at a standatill. Abbé Judaine had been able to reach the Grotto will the monstrance, but he patiently remained there before And then all the voices, the thousands of voices, began to sing the chant of adoration and gratitude. The procession found itself glitter of white and gold in the rays of the setting sun.

her whole being. But the crowd wanted to see her walk; delighted women called to her, a group surrounded her, and swept her cantiele lasted, a burning prayer of faith and love ascended from totrotten. Pierre followed her, while she, stammering and hesitating, she who for seven years had not used her legs, advanced proved true, as patent as the very light of the sun. Her box was towards the Verification Office, so that the miracle might be ness of seeing her thus return to her childhood. Ahl the dear with adorable awkwardness, the uneasy, charming gait of a little child making its first steps; and it was so affecting, so delicious, that the young priest thought of nothing but the immense happiness of cooling but the the library has a little of cooling the state.

friend of infancy, the dear tenderness of long ago, so she wou at last be the beautiful and charming woman that she had pr mised to be as a young girl when, in the little garden at Neuill she had looked so gay and pretty beneath the tall trecs flecked wit

The crowd continued to applaud her furiously, a huge wave o people accompanied her; and all remained awaiting her egress swarming in a fever before the door, when she had entered the office, whither Pierre only was admitted with her.

That particular afternoon there were few people at the Verification Office. The small square room, with its hot wooden walls and rudimentary furniture, its rush-bottomed chairs, and its two tables of unequal height, contained, apart from the usual staff, only some five or six doctors, seated and silent. At the tables were the inspector of the piscinas and two young Abbés making entries in the registers, and consulting the sets of documents; while Father Dargeles, at one end, wrote a paragraph for his newspaper. And, as it happened, Doetor Bonamy was just then examining Elise Rouquet, who, for the third time, had come to have the increasing cicatrisation of her sore certified.

Anyhow, gentlemen," exclaimed the doctor, "have you ever seen a lupus heal in this way, so rapidly? I am aware that a new work has appeared on faith-healing in which it is stated that certain sores may have a nervous origin. Only that is by no means proved in the case of lupus, and I defy a committee of doctors, to assemble and explain mademoiselle's cure by ordinary

He paused, and turning towards Father Dargelès, inquired Have you noted, Father, that the suppuration has completely disappeared, and that the skin is resuming its natural colour?"

However, he did not wait for the reply, for just then Marie entered, followed by Pierre; and by her beaming radiance he immediately guessed what good fortune was befalling him. looked superb, admirably fitted to transport and convert the multitude! He therefore promptly dismissed Elise Rouquet, inquired the new arrival's name, and asked one of the young priests to look for her papers. Then, as she slightly staggered, he wished to seat her in the armehair.

"Oh no! oh no!" she exclaimed. "I am so happy to be able to use my legs!"

Pierre, with a glance, had sought for Doctor Chassaigne, whom he was sorry not to see there. He remained on one side, waiting while they rummaged in the untidy drawers without being able to place their hands on the required papers. "Let's see," repeated papers, "Marie de Guersaint, Marie de Guersaint. I have certainly seen that name before."

At last Raboin discovered the documents classified under a wrong letter: and when the doctor has perused the two inedical

Paris faculty, whose names are well known to us all." the most incredulous, for they are signed by two doctors of the least doubt of it, these two certificates would suffice to convince with a very serious lesion of the marrow. And, if one had the certificates he became quite enthusiastic. "Here is something very interesting, gentlemen," said he. "I beg you to listen attentively. This young lady, whom you see standing here, was affilicted the medical men who had drawn up these documents enjoyed Then he passed the certificates to the doctors present, who read their, was ging their beads the while. It was beyond dispute;

the reputation of being honest and elever practitioners.

we will now see what change has taken place in the young lady's cannot be when a patient brings us documents of this value-"Well, gentlemen, if the diagnosis is not disputed-and it-

"Monsieur l'Abbé," said he, "you came from Paris with Made-moiselle de Guersaint, I think. Did you converse with the doctors However, before questioning her he turned towards Pierre.

before your departure?"

The priest shuddered amidst all his great delight. "I was certificates to nothing, reveal the other diagnosis, the one that allowed of the cure being explained scientifically? The miracle which were identical. And was he, Pierre, to reduce these Beauclair smiling, while his colleggues drew up their certificates, the two doctors, so serious and rational, and he onee more saw And again the scene rose up before him. He once more saw present at the consultation, monsieur, he replied.

that the presence of the Abbe gives these proofs additional weight. "You will observe, gentlemen," now resumed Dr. Bonamy, had been predieted, shattered beforehand.

However, mademoiselle will now tell us exactly what she felt."
He had leant over Father Dargeles shoulder to impress upon him that he must not forget to make Pierre play the part of a witness in the narrative, miracle fall on me in a eracking of all my bones, of all my lightning." Were boiling, a voice cried to me: Risel Risel And I felt the boold ym it se bomoes it seemed as if my blood with all my soull I ended by surrendering myself like a child. Blessed Virgin, Our Lady of Lourdes, do with me as thou will, an instant I doubted. Then the feeling stopped. But it began again as soon as I recommenced praying. Oh! I prayed, I prayed legs again, I was afraid it might only be another attack. a little while ago, when the pins and needles seized me in the Yuq Zer Yesterday I had felt certain that I should be cured. in a halting voice, broken by her surging happiness. Non Dieul gentlemen, how can I tell you?" exclaimed Marie

Pierre, very pale, listened to her. Beanclair had positively told friend of infancy, the dear tenderness of long ago, so she would at last be the beautiful and charming woman that she had promised to be as a young girl when, in the little garden at Neuilly, she had looked so gay and pretty beneath the tall trees flecked with sunlight!

The crowd continued to applaud her furiously, a huge wave of people accompanied her; and all remained awaiting her egress, swarming in a fever before the door, when she had entered the office, whither Pierre only was admitted with her.

That particular afternoon there were few people at the Verification Office. The small square room, with its hot wooden walls and rudimentary furniture, its rush-bottomed chairs, and its two tables of unequal height, contained, apart from the usual staff, only some five or six doctors, seated and silent. At the tables were the inspector of the piscinas and two young Abbés making entries in the registers, and consulting the sets of documents; while Father Dargelès, at one end, wrote a paragraph for his newspaper. And, as it happened, Doctor Bonamy was just then examining Elisc Rouquet, who, for the third time, had come to have the increasing cicatrisation of her sore certified.

"Anyhow, gentlemen," exclaimed the doctor, "have you ever

"Anyhow, gentlemen," exclaimed the doctor, "have you ever seen a lupus heal in this way, so rapidly? I am aware that a new work has appeared on faith-healing in which it is stated that certain sores may have a nervous origin. Only that is by no means proved in the case of lupus, and I defy a committee of doctors to assemble and explain mademoiselle's cure by ordinary means.'

He paused, and turning towards Father Dargelès, inquired "Have you noted, Father, that the suppuration has completely disappeared, and that the skin is resuming its natural colour?"

However, he did not wait for the reply, for just then Marie entered, followed by Pierre; and by her beaming radiance he immediately guessed what good fortune was befalling him. She looked superb, admirably fitted to transport and convert the multitude! He therefore promptly dismissed Elise Rouquet, inquired the new arrival's name, and asked one of the young priests to look for her papers. Then, as she slightly staggered, he wished to scat her in the armchair.

"Oh no! oh no!" she exclaimed. "I am so happy to be able to use my legs!"

Pierre, with a glanee, had sought for Doctor Chassaigne, whom he was sorry not to see there. He remained on one side, waiting while they runmaged in the untidy drawers without being able to place their hands on the required papers. "Let's see," repeated Dr. Bonamy; "Marie de Guersaint, Marie de Guersaint. I have certainly seen that name before."

At last Raboin discovered the documents classified under a wrong letter; and when the doctor has perused the two medical

नुवादितः स्ट्टाधागुरु । । । । । । । । । yoursiant Lyppe' for the price occupied so prequently you no already say that mademoiselle has been born again. tos jou ji si ing of the tissues will proceed somewhat slowly, but one can siognomy has recovered its lively gaiety. Without doubt, the healthe young lady. Her eyes are bright, her colour is rosy, her phyvalescence here; health is at once restored, full, entire. Observe Doctor Bonany victorionsly. "I will add diat we have no con-"The case is beyond science, that is all I can assume," concluded invalid frame, when life should re-enter it, with the will to be cured and be happy. and death, gaily blooming. But Beanclair had also foreseen this sudden joyinl change, this straightening and resplendency of her And, in fact, slie already appeared strong to him, her checks full ့ညာရှာ palamings ု့ခ်ကျန်ရှာမျာ မေထုံ နောကျွည့် witnessed these marvels, Monsient l'Abbé, so you will not refuse to sign the careful report which the reverend l'ather has drawn consulting together, and the doctor ended by saying; "You have account of the affair. They exchanged a few words in low tones, Dargeles, who was linishing his note, a brief but fairly complete Once again, however, had Doctor Bonany, leant over Pather

np for publication in the Journal de la Crotte?"

in ppiness at seeing her saved. Since they had ceased questioning her she had come and leant on his arm, and remained smilling at him with eyes full of enthusiasm. all, Marie's divine Joy filled his heart. He was penetrated with deep But he felt the weight of his eassed on his shoulders, and above consect him and he was on the point of shouting out the truth. He-Pierre-sign that page of error and falsehood?

so beautiful, so youngl-And how pleased my father, my poor a low voice. "She has been so good to me, I am now so well, "Oh, my friend, thank the Blessed Virginl" she murnimed in it sacrifegious to interfere with the faith of that child; the great but it was enough that she should be saved, he would have thought Everything was collapsing within him, Then Pierre signed. "lod lliw asilina pure faith which had healed her.

witnessed! And, all at once, the idea occurred to her that as it now many tears, how much despair, how many had days it had coffin in which she had sometimes increined herself buried aliver Ahl that box in which she had lived so many years, that tolling which she had abandoned before the Grotto, had brought it to the office, and when she found it there she felt deeply moved that she might fatigue herself and again require her hitle car, However, certain charitable persons, fearing miracle was official. afresh, the crowd chapped their hands. It now seemed that the When Marie reappeared outside the office the applaire beam him that the cure would come like a lightning flash; that under the influence of extreme excitement a sudden awakening of will so long somnolent would take place within her.

"It was my legs which the Holy Virgin first of all delivered," she continued. "I could well feel that the iron bands which bound them were gliding along my skin like broken chains. Then the weight which still suffocated me, there, in the left side, began to ascend; and I thought I was going to die, it hurt me so. But it passed my chest, it passed my throat, and I felt it there in my mouth, and spat it out violently. It was all over; I no longer had any pain, it had flown away!"

She had made a gesture expressive of the motion of a night bird beating its wings, and, lapsing into silence, stood smiling at Pierre, who was bewildered. Beauelair had told him all that beforehand, using almost the same words and the same imagery. Point by point, his prognostics were realised; there was nothing more in the case than natural phenomena, which had been foreseen.

Raboin, however, had followed Marie's narrative with dilated eyes and the passion of a pictist of limited intelligence, ever haunted by the idea of hell. "It was the devil," he cried; "it was the devil that she spat out!"

Doetor Bonamy, who was more wary, made him hold his tongue. And turning towards the doetors he said: "Gentlemen, you know that we always avoid pronouncing the big word of miracle here. Only here is a fact, and I am curious to know how any of you can explain it by natural means. Seven years ago this young lady was struck with serious paralysis, evidently due to a lesion of the marrow. And that cannot be denied; the certificates are there, irrefutable. She could no longer walk, she could no longer make a movement without a cry of pain, she had reached that extreme state of exhaustion which precedes little by little an unfortunate issue. All at once, however, she rises, walks, laughs, and beams on us. The paralysis has completely disappeared, no pain remains, she is as well as you and I. Come, gentlemen, approach, examine ther, and tell me what has happened."

He triumphed. Not one of the doetors spoke. Two, who were doubtless true Catholics, had shown their approval of his speech by their vigorous nods, while the others remained motionless, with a constrained air, not caring to mix themselves up in the business. However, a little thin man, whose eyes shone behind the glasses he was wearing, ended by rising to take a closer look at Marie. He caught hold of her hand, examined the pupils of her eyes, and merely seemed preocenpied by the air of transfiguration which she wore. Then, in a very courteous manner, without even showing a desire to discuss the matter, he came back and sat down again.

had so long been linked with her sufferings, it ought also to share her triumph. It was a sudden inspiration, a kind of holy folly,

that made her seize the handle.

At that moment the procession passed by, returning from the Grotto, where Abbé Judaine had pronounced the Benediction. And thereupon Maric, dragging the little car, placed herself behind the eanopy. And, in her slippers, her head covered with a strip of lace, her hosom heaving, her face creet, glowing, and superb, she walked on behind the clergy, dragging after her that car of misery, that rolling coffin, in which she had endured so much agony. And the crowd which acclaimed her, the frantic crowd, followed in her wake.

iv

TRIUMPH-DESPAIR

Pienut: also had followed Marie, and like her was behind the canopy, carried along as it were by the blast of glory which made her drag her little car along in triumph. Every moment, however, there was so much tempestuous pushing that the young priest would assuredly have fallen if a rough hand had not upheld him.

"Don't be alarmed," said a voice; "give me your arm, otherwise you won't be able to remain on your fcet."

Pierre turned round, and was surprised to recognise Father Massias, who had left Father Fourcade in the pulpit in order to accompany the procession. An extraordinary fever was sustaining him, throwing him forward, as solid as a rock, with eyes glowing like live coals, and an excited face covered with perspiration.

"Take care, then!" he again exclaimed; "give me your arm."

A fresh luman wave had almost swept them away. And Pierre now yielded to the support of this terrible enthusiast, whom he remembered as a fellow-student at the seminary. What a singular meeting it was, and how greatly he would have liked to possess that violent faith, that mad faith, which was making Massias pant, with his throat full of sobs, whilst he continued giving vent to the ardent entreaty: "Lord Jesus, heal our sick!"

There was no eessation of this cry behind the canopy, where there was always a crier whose duty it was to accord no respite to the slow elemency of Heaven. At times a thick voice full of anguish, and at others a shrill and piercing voice, would arise. The Father's, which was an imperious one, was now at last breek-

ing through sheer emotion.

The rumour of Marie's wondrous cure, of the miracle whose "Lord Jesus, heal our sick! Lord Jesus, heal our sick!"

oben peaks and enger bande which consumed all present, and raised them up with blacking, a suddrif to Burgeol a fire for life, but a longuag graphed was passing, and now it was not merely a question of alling touching it, of being enred and becoming happy. The Divinity and all yielded to the desire of beholding the Sacrament and Blessed Sacriment like the resistless flux of a rising tide. One delitium which now caused it to which and trush towards the increased vertigo of the niultitude, the attack of configures one to the other end of Lourdes; and frem this had come the finne would speedily fill all Christendom, had already spread from had decided to accompany his men. He commanded them, careflerthind, who teared the excesses of this religious adoration, in order that it might not be broken. "Close your ranks-eloser" he called, "and keep your fully watching over the double chain of barrers beside the canopy

"lbəzini ylarılı zarıs

ple rolled towards the procession from that and threatened to pushing, but there was constant eddying, and deep waves of peoassaults of the throng. Nobody, certainly, fancied that he was Amurio and the neet, kept on giving way mader the involuntary which they formed, shoulder to shoulder, with army linked at the bearers, had an extremely difficult daty to discharge. The wall These young men, chosen from among the most vigorous of the

there, the priest unxionaly turned his ever on Berthaul. sporte aminimate it in doing es Accordingly, while standing and disputit may it in socious in the midit that though they passion of all that multitude, the Divinity they demanded to kiss, ed that the golden monstrance, rediant his a sun, was the one fearing that a final push would throw him over, for he fully realis-the vast expanse, and were whiching, assiling him from all sides, to go any farther. Lunierous conflicting currents had set in over Rosaire, Abbé Judaine really thought that he would be unable When the canopy had reached the middle of the Place du tool reban belignest but hunging all nego meant of ot of bloom approach and kneel at the priset's feet. What divine grace it protrading, in the wild desire that they might be allowed to equi ban beabstatelun emin, aliw paiddos oraw egnied badabatw Voices, however, were rising in application on all sides, The orders are precise; you hear meet had so long been linked with her sufferings, it ought also to share her triumph. It was a sudden inspiration; a kind of holy folly,

"Let nobody passing called the latter to the boners-"lessny violent to."

that made her seize the handle.

At that moment the procession passed by, returning from the Grotto, where Abbé Judaine had pronounced the Benediction. And thereupon Marie, dragging the little car, placed herself behind the canopy. And, in her slippers, her head covered with a strip of lace, her bosom heaving, her face erect, glowing, and superb, she walked on behind the elergy, dragging after her that ear of misery, that rolling coffin, in which she had endured so much agony. And the growd which acclaimed her, the frantic growd, followed in her wake.

IV

TRIUMPH-DESPAIR

Pienus also had followed Marie, and like her was behind the eanopy, carried along as it were by the blast of glory which made her drag her little car along in triumph. Every moment, however, there was so much tempestuous pushing that the young priest would assuredly have fallen if a rough hand had not upheld him. "Don't be alarmed," said a voice; "give me your arm, otherwise you won't be able to remain on your feet."

Pierre turned round, and was surprised to recognise Father Massias, who had left Father Fourcade in the pulpit in order to accompany the procession. An extraordinary fever was sustaining him, throwing him forward, as solid as a rock, with eyes glowing like live coals, and an excited face covered with perspiration.

"Take care, then!" he again exclaimed; "give me your arm."

A fresh human wave had almost swept them away. And Pierre now yielded to the support of this terrible enthusiast, whom he remembered as a fellow-student at the seminary. What a singular meeting it was, and how greatly he would have liked to possess that violent faith, that mad faith, which was making Massias pant, with his throat full of sobs, whilst he continued giving vent to the ardent entreaty: "Lord Jesus, heal our sick! Lord Jesus, heal our siek!"

There was no cessation of this ery behind the canopy, where there was always a erier whose duty it was to accord no respite to the slow elemency of Heaven. At times a thick voice full of anguish, and at others a shrill and piereing voice, would arise. The Father's, which was an imperious one, was now at last break

ing through sheer emotion

by the whole procession! An infirm old man displayed his withered hand in the conviction that it would be made sound again were he only allowed to touch the monstrance. A dumb woman wildly pushed her way through the throng with her broad shoulders, in order that she might loosen her tongue by a kiss. Others were shouting, imploring, and even elenching their fists in their rage with those cruel men who denied cure to their bodily sufferings and their mental wretchedness. The orders to keep them back were rigidly enforced, however, for the most serious accidents were feared.

"Nobody, nobody!" repeated Berthaud; "let nobody whatever pass!"

There was a woman there, however, who touched every heart with compassion. Clad in wretched garments, bare-headed, her face wet with tears, she was holding in her arms a little boy of ten years old or so, whose limp, paralysed legs hung down inertly. The lad's weight was too great for one so weak as herself, still she did not seem to feel it. She had brought the boy there, and was now entreating the bearers with an invineible obstinacy which neither words nor hustling could conquer.

At last, as Abbé Iudaine, who felt deeply moved, beekoned to her to approach, two of the bearers, in deference to his compassion, drew apart, despite all the danger of opening a breach, and the woman then rushed forward with her burden, and fell in a heap before the priest. For a moment he rested the foot of the monstrance on the child's head, and the mother herself pressed her eager, longing lips to it; and, as they started off again, she wished to remain behind the canopy, and followed the procession, with streaming hair and panting breast, staggering the while under the heavy burden, which was fast exhausting her strength.

They managed, with great difficulty, to cross the remainder of the Place du Rosaire, and then the ascent began, the glorious ascent by way of the monumental incline; whilst up on high, on the fringe of Heaven, the Basilica reared its slim spire, whence pealing bells were winging their flight, sounding the triumphs of Our Lady of Lourdes. And now it was towards an apotheosis that the canopy slowly climbed, towards the lofty portal of the high-perched sanctuary which stood open face to face with the Infinite, high above the linge multitude whose waves continued soaring across the valley's squares and avenues. Preceding the processional cross, the magnificent beadle, all blue and silver, was already nearing the level of the Rosary cupola, the spacious esplanade formed by the roof of the lower church, across which itself. inaccessible summits, to the transplendent threshold of Paradase tor leagues and leagues, ever higher and higher, to the most redeinption, which she was carrying up that incline with its resonnating flagstones—she would have liked to drig it yet farther, t were their double cross, her own redemption and ber friend's dragged her little car along with unwearying hands, and-as though me that I have won your salvation even as you have wen mine!" Tell me that our mutual prayers have been granted; tell you even in saving me. Yes, I felt your soul mingling with my I prayed for it so fervently, and she granted my prayer, and saved great happiness should have fallen on us together-yes, together? "O Pierre, Pierrel" she stammered, "how sweet it is that thus shall be happy for ever! I feel all needful strength for happiness, Plerre, it is rapturous delight We have been saved together, we chosen without you, to some yonder without youl. But with you, been my grief had I thus ascended into light alone. Ohl to be "If you only knew," she continued, "how great would have toil bun roll of greeylping, he was obliged to insuer her and lie, yes, strength enough to raise the world!"

One is here irresistibly reminded of the car of Juggernaut, and of the Hindoo fanatics throwing themselves beneath its wheels in the belief that they would thus obtain an entrance into Paradlsc.—Trans.

He understood her mistake and shuddered.

though a brutal hatchet-stroke were parting them for ever, Amidst But even while he spoke he felt a deep rending within him, felicity. "Yes, yes, be happy, Marie," he said, "for I am terre happy myself, and all our sufferings are redeented." aind pur irais irui Schung Bulliods jo rapi oui ir Bulliokai bullian who abidy alias vitibility would be more formation upset him that he averted his eyes, in despair at resping such es tilpundt gebbus zidt. Izid od organ roven bluow ode tadt Noe sing was cured and he remained alone in his hell, reposing to himknew to be still his own, since she could belong to note. But now of childhood's days, the first artlessly loved woman, whom he their common sufferings, she had hithere remained the little irn ad

sid of han amended of standard no of spoke M. 24. ". "Alysina Signi loculus est ad patres notifos, Abraham, et emini etus in unditude to God, shouted the final verse in a threadening witer umwoln ein mer od en bodrocde Buidton Buigog ban guidlon However, the chant went on, and Enther M says branen

Tiava tol base

covered to which trave offt of the beginning thater tiffl bigher, 4ill and ever bigher, did it full intil it findless of the the wheels of Marie's car grated again to granife craft of stonest And the procession or see this han and the han the furnity of to be made up that rough acclivity, with its large slippory flact Yet another incline had to be climbed, vet another effort had of the tunions of an bowega, goain out some the lin bak

i

On Pierre's other side, the right, Berthaud, who no longer had any cause for anxiety, was now also following the canony. had given his bearers orders to break their chain, and was gazing with an expression of delight on the human sea through which the procession had lately passed. The higher they ascended the incline, the more did the Place du Rosaire and the avenues and paths of the gardens expand below them, black with the swarming multitude. It was a bird's-eye view of a whole nation, an anthill which ever increased in size, spreading farther and farther away. "Look!" Berthaud at last exclaimed to Pierre. "How vast and how beautiful it is! Ah! well, the year won't have been a bad one after all.'

Looking upon Lourdes as a centre of propaganda, where his political raneour found satisfaction, he always rejoiced when there was a numerous pilgrimage, as in his mind it was bound to prove unpleasant to the Government. Ah, thought he, if they had only been able to bring the working classes of the towns thither, and create a Catholie democracy. "Last year we scarcely reached the figure of two hundred thousand pilgrims," he continued, "but we shall exceed it this year, I hope." And then, with the gay air of the jolly fellow that he was, despite his sectarian passions, he added, "Well, 'pon my word, I was really pleased just now when, there was such a crush. Things are looking up, I thought, things are looking up."

Pierre, however, was not listening to him; his mind had been struck by the grandeur of the spectacle. That multitude, which spread out more and more as the procession rose higher and higher above it; that magnificent valley, which was hollowed out below and ever became more and more extensive, displaying afar off its gorgeous horizon of mountains, filled him with quivering admiration. His mental trouble was increased by it all, and seeking Marie's glance, he waved his arm to draw her attention to the vast circular expanse of country. And his gesture deceived her, for in the purely spiritual excitement that possessed her she did not behold the material spectacle he pointed at, but thought that he was calling earth to witness the prodigious favours which the Blessed Virgin had heaped upon them both; for she imagined that he had had his share of the miraele, and that in the stroke of grace which had set her ereet with her flesh healed, he, so near to her that their hearts mingled, had felt himself enveloped and raised by the same divine power, his soul saved from doubt, conquered by faith once more. How could he have witnessed her wondrous cure, indeed, without being convinced? Morcover, she had prayed so fervently for him outside the Grotto on the previous night. And now, therefore, to her execssive delight she espied him transfigured like herself, weeping and laughing restored to God again. And this lent increased force to her bliceful favor, she

they were two curtains of sober bue drawn across the margin of the ing but a neutral, somewhat violet, background, as though, indeed, of bare rock, spotted with patches of short herbage, formed nothdour behind the little Gers and the big Gers, those two huge ridges -nolds betor in guidais sew Vienning Brindoob od noon anot obline

norizon.

again shone forth like another sun, a sun of pure gold, describing the sign of the cross in streaks of flame apon the threshold of the God When, in the rays of the setting sun, the illumined monstrance or agreement of the waves of the president the glory of breath were passing, rolling those billows of little pale faces which sign of the cross which enveloped it. It seemed as though a divine mankind! The multitude below had quivered beneath that great the visible horizon: Peace upon earth, hope and consolition to chains linking the distant peaks, the whole earth, even beyond and he sainted the woods, the torrents, the mountains, the faint Gave, the big and the little Gers, already drowsy, in front of him; he saluted the new and the old town, the eastle bathed by the of the dim valleys, and the emmirpled hills of Viscus, on his right; and the Miramont, upon his left; he saluted the huge fallen rocks sabited the convents, the heights of Le Buala, the Serre de Julos, cribe a funce of the cross against the vanit of heaven. moved it slowly from one to the other horizon, causing it to des-Abbe Judaine with both hands raise the Blessed Sacrament. He And higher and still higher, in front of this immensity, did to witness the Benediction, and had been told of the unracle. by two ladies, who kissed her, weeping. They were Madame de Jonquière and her danghter Raymonde, who had come thither also entering it, still dragging her car by the handle, was stopped were already returning into the Basiliea, when Marie, who was The humers, the clergy, with Abbe Indaine under the canopy. ionung.

"Ahl my dear child, what happiness!" repeated the Lady-hospi-ller; "and how proud I am to have you in my ward! It is so precious a favour for all of us that the Blessel Virgin should have

Raymonde, meanwhile, had kept one of the young girls hands ู้ แก้สวออุอร ๑ๅ ก้อรษอุป นอ๊อดุ me kiss you again. It will bring me happiness." so pleased to see you walking, so strong and beautiful already Lat in her own. "Will you allow me to call you my friend, made-moiselle?" said she, "I felt so much pity for you, and I am now

"Thank you, thank you with all my heart." Marie stammered her, and we will take her back after the ceremony." You hear met Raymonde? We must follow her, and kneel beside anidet her rapture. "I am so happy, so very happy!"

"Oh! we will not leave you, resumed Madame de Jouquiere.

Thereupon the two ladies joined the cortige, and, following the gigantic inclined ways, on the stone balcony overlooking the stretch of country outside the portal of the Basilica. Abbé Judaine stepped forward holding the Blessed Sacrament aloft with both hands. Marie, who had pulled her ear up the balcony steps way near him, her heart beating from her evention, her tave all aplow amidst the gold of her loosened hair. Then all the elengy, the snowy surplices and the darrhing chasubles, ranged themselves behind, whilst the banners waved liked bunting decking the white balustrades. And a solemn minute followed.

From on high there could have been no grander spectucle, blish, immediately below, there was the multitude, the human sea with its dark waves, its heaving hillows, now for a mannent stilled, amidst which you only distinguished the small pule specks of the faces uplified towards the hasiliea, in expectancy of the Benedle tion; and as far as the eye could reach, from the Place du Rusaine to the Gave, along the paths and avenues and across the open spaces, even to the old town in the distance, those little pole faces multiplied and multiplied, all with lips parted, and eyes lived upon the argust threshold where heaven was about to open to their gaze.

Then the vast amphitheatre of slopes and lifts and mountaine iged aloft, ascended upon all sides, crosts following crosts, milling faded away in the far-blue atmosphere. The amproval convents among the trees on the lirst of the northean slopes, heyond the torrent-those of the Carnelltes, the Dominicans, the Assumptionists, and the Sisters of Nevers-were calonical by a may reflect tion from the fire-like glow of the smiset. They would impose rose one above the other, until they reached the heights of Lie Buala, which were surmounted by the Sene de Jules, he its turn capped by the Miramont.

Deep valleys opened on the south, narraw garges between offer of gigantic rocks whose bases were already alreaded in lakes of bluey shadow, whilst the summits sparkled with the multing landwell of the san. The lills of Viseus upon this side were empurph ed, and showed like a promuntory of coral, in front of the stagment lake of the other, which was bright with a supplification transpa rency. But, on the east, in front of you, the horizon again sprind out to the very point of intersection of the seven valleys. The each which had formerly guarded them still stood with its keep, its lofty walls, its black outlines—the outlines of a fleree forties of feudal time-upon the rock whose hase was watered by the Cave; and upon this side of the stern old pile was the new town, looking quite gay amidst its gardens, with its swarm of white housedronle, its large hotels, its lodging-houses, and its fine chops, whose win dows were glowing like live embers; whilst, behind the costle, the discoloured roofs of old Lourdes spread out in confusion, in a ruddy light which hovered over them like a cloud of dust, As this

But all this was not sufficient; other riches, riches of every kind, there in memory of a miraculous conversion. epaulets and swords of officers, together with a superb sabre, left and even spurs, in glass eases or frames. There were also the and some of quite an unexpected description. There were bridal wreaths and crosses of honour, jewels and photographs, chaplets, Moreover, the adominents comprised many other votive offerings, of all the hands, trembling with gratifude, which had offered them. whose infinite number deeply impressed you when you thought then. It was a swarming, a prodigious resplendency of hearts, around the nave, there extended a long frieze of words, the delight employing these hearts to trace in tall letters the various words which the Blessed Virgin had addressed to Bernadette; and thus, Below the triforium somebody had had the ingenious idea of eribed sestoons and garlands, others, again, climbed up the pillars, surrounded the windows, and constellated the deep, dim chapels, were grouped together in the form of mystical roses; others deseverywhere, glittering on the walls like stars in the heavens. Some and thousands of gold and silver hearts which were hanging Then, after the banners, there were other marvels, the thousands around the triforium. And others, again, displayed themselves on the walls, waved in the depths of the side-chapels, and encompasted the choir with a heaven of silk, satin, and velvet. You could see the choir with a heaven of silk, satin, and velvet. You could them by hundreds, and your eyes grew weary of admiring them. Alany of them were quite eelebrated, so renowned for their skilful workmanship that talented embroidresses took the trouble to come to Lourdes on purpose to examine them. Among these were the banner of our Lady of Fourvières, bearing the arms of the city of Lyons, the banner of Alsace, of black velvet embroidered with gold; the banner of Lorraine, on which you beheld the virgin easting her cloak around two children, and the white the binder of Brittany, on which bled the Sacred Heart of Lorner of Brittany, on which bled the Sacred Heart of Jesus in the midst of a halo. All empires and kingdoms of the cauth were represented; the most distant lands—Canada, Brazil, Chili, Haiti—here had their flags, which, in all picty, were being offered as a tribute of homage to the Queen of Heaven.

 195 EUCRDES

canopy, walked beside Pierre and Father Massias, between the rows of chairs which the deputations already occupied, to the very centre of the choir. The hanners alone were allowed on either side of the high altar; but Marie advanced to its steps, still dragging her car, whose wheels resonnded over the flagstones. She had at last brought it to the spot whither the sacred madness of her desire had longingly impelled her to drag it. brought it, indeed, woeful, wretched-looking as it was, into the splendour of God's house, so that it might there testify to the truth of the miracle. The threshold had scarcely been crossed when the organs burst into a hymn of triumph, the sonorous acclamation of a happy people, from amidst which there soon arose a celestial, angelie voice, of joyful shrillness and crystalline Abbé Judaine had placed the Blessed Sacrament upon the altar, and the crowd was streaming into the nave, each taking a seat, instailing him or herself in a corner, pending the commencement of the ceremony. Marie had at once fallen on her knees between Madame de Jenquière and Raymonde, whose eyes were moist with tender emotion; whilst Father Massias, exhausted by the extraordinary tension of his nerves which had been sustaining · him ever since his departure from the Grotta, had sunk upon the ground, sobbing, with his head between his hands. Behind him Pierre and Berthaud remained standing, the latter still busy with his superintendence, his eyes ever on the watch, seeing that good order was preserved even during the most violent outbursts of emotion. Then, amidst all his mental confusion, increased by the deafening strains of the organ, Pierre raised his head and examined the interior of the Basilica. The nave was narrow and lofty, and streaked with bright colours, which numerous windows flooded with light. There were searcely any aisles; they were reduced to the proportions of a mere passage running between the side-chapels and the clustering columns, and this circumstance seemed to increase the slim loftiness of the nave, the souring of the stonework in perpendicular lines of infantile, graceful slenderness. gilded railing, as transparent as lace, closed the choir, where the high altar, of white marble richly sculptured, arose in all its lavish chasteness. But the feature of the building which astonished you was the mass of extraordinary ornamentation which transformed the whole of it into an overflowing exhibition of embroidery and iewellery, what with all the banners and votive offerings, the perfect river of gifts which had flowed into it, and remained clinging to its walls in a stream of gold and silver, velvet and silk, covering it from top to bottom. It was, so to say, the ever-glowing sanctuary "of gratitude, whose thousand rich adornments seemed to be chanting a perpetual canticle of faith and thankfulness,

The banners, in particular, abounded, as innumerable as the leaves of trees. Some thirty hung from the vanlted roof, whilst others were suspended, like pictures, between the little columns

Berthand, feigning to admire some banner and requesting informalave, he sorely envied. For a moment, moreover, he questioned prostration an aunihilation, anidst the consuming illusion of divine tion respecting it.

"Which one?" asked the Superintendent of the Bearers, "that face banner over there?"

so tine that if you crumpled the banner up, you could hold it in Le Puy and Lourdes linked together by the Rosary. The Jace is "Yes, that one on the left."
"Ohl it is a banner affered by Le Pay. The arms are those of piration, and, crossing the sacristy, descended into the crypt by But immediately afterwards he had an insthe open doorway. the building, so densely did the serried throng of believers bar another fear suddenly eame to him, that of being unable to leave with Doctor Chassaigne as a prefext for his departure, grief. In a few words he excused himself, giving his appointment self, vanish into some shadowy corner, and there, at last, yent his they would accompany her back, he might surely go off by him-Marie had Madame de Jonquière and Raymonde with her, and of the gold and silver hearts, as imminicrable as stars. And Pierre lacked the strength to remain there any longer. And then Sacrament looked like the sovereign planet annidst the scintillations again was a canticle chanted, whilst, on the altar, the Blessed mony was about to begin. Again did the organs resonnd, and However, Abbe Indaine was now stepping forwards the cerethe hollow of your hand."

who came thither from the four corners of the world. there were priests, speaking all languages, to absolve the sinners quillity of the bowels of the earth, that sins were confessed, and double row of confessionals; for it was here, in the lifeless tranfrom top to bottom with marble votive offerings, you only saw a the last sleep. And along the passages, against their sides, covered very stones of the tainb, in which all men must some day sleep up there, a nivide terror reigned in that semi-obscurity, where the invisiony ever quivered. The chapel walls remained bare, like the a subterement chantel inder the apsis, where some little langs rein the rock, the crypt formed two narrow passages, parted by a massive block of stone which upheld the nave, and conducting to joyons chants and prodigious radiance of the Basilica above. Cut Deep silence and sepulchral gloom suddenly succeeded to the the narrow interior stairway.

knees. It was not, however, through any need of prayer and worship, but because his whole being was giving way beneath his deep silence, that darkness, that coolness of the grave, fell upon his Basilier above the erept here ever so faintly; and he, amidst that At that hour, however, when the multitude was throughly the

was the resplendency when the choir's score of chandeliers was illumined, when the hundreds of lamps and the hundreds of candles burned all together, at the great evening ceremonies! The whole church then became a conflagration, the thousands of gold and silver hearts reflecting all the little flames with thousands of flery scintillations. It was like a huge and wondrous brasier; the walls streamed with live flakes of light; you seemed to be entering into the blinding glory of Paradise itself; whilst on all sides the innumerable banners spread out their silk, their satin, and their velvet, embroidered with sanguifluous Sacred Hearts, victorious saints, and Virgins whose kindly smiles engendered miracles.

Ah! how many ceremonies had already displayed their pomp in that Basilical Worship, prayer, chanting never ceased there. From one end of the year to the other incense smoked, organs roared, and kneeling multitudes prayed there with their whole souls. Masses, vespers, sermons were continually following one upon another; day by day the religious exercises began afresh, and each festival of the Church was celebrated with unparalleled magnificence. The least noteworthy anniversary supplied a pretext for pompous solemnities. Each pilgrimage was granted its share of the dazzling resplendency. It was necessary that those suffering ones and those humble ones who had come from such long distances should be sent home consoled and enraptured, earrying with them a vision of Paradise espied through its opening portals. They beheld the luxurious surroundings of the Divinity, and would for ever remain enraptured by the sight. In the depths of bare, wretehed rooms, indeed, by the side of humble pallets of suffering throughout all Christendom, a vision of the Basilica with its blazing riches continually arose like a vision of fortune itself, like a vision of the wealth of that life to be, into which the poor would surely some day enter after their long, long misery in this terrestrial sphere.

Pierre, however, felt no delight; no eonsolation, no hope came to him as he gazed upon all the splendour. His frightful feeling of discomfort was increasing, all was becoming black within him, with that blackness of the tempest which gathers when man's thoughts and feelings pant and shriek. He had felt immense desolation rising in his soul ever since Marie, erying that she was healed, had risen from her little car and walked along with such strength and fulness of life. Yet he loved her like a passionately attached brother, and had experienced unlimited happiness on seeing that she no longer suffered. Why, therefore, should her felicity bring him such agony? He could now no longer gaze at her. kneeling there, radiant amidst her tears, with beauty recovered and increased, without his poor heart bleeding as from some mortal wound. Still he wished to remain there, and so, averting his eyes, he tried to interest himself in Father Massias, who was still shaking with violent sobbing on the flagstones, and whose separation; she on her side saved, radiant amidst the hosannahs of the triumphant Basilica; and he lost, sobbing with wretchedness, bowed down in the depths of the dark crypt in an icy, gravelike solitude. It was as though he had just lost her again, and this time for ever and for ever.

during the past hour, it was only through this final rending which, this time, part hour, it was only through this final tending which, ers, had mught of his being free, save his brain, in order that he might suffer the more. She had still been his so long as she had not belonged to another, and if he had being eight not be to another; and if he had been his so long such agony children, no doubt. Whereas he, buried, as it were, to his shouldthin building rails strict build him a military appropriate of the control of the fled away alone, leaving him in the cold grave. The whole vide raise the tombetone which crushed and imprisoned his flesh. She beautiful, living, and desirable. He, who was dead, hawever, could not become a man again. Sever more would be be able to She had all at once appeared to him very strong, very "UPUIOM 1: a woman. But behold! she was cured. Dehold! she had become since she, stricken in her sex by incurable illn. 23, would never be priest, saying to himself that he might well renounce his manhood lost Marie for the first time on the day when he had become a the terrible erisis of wee amidst which he was struggling. He had heart. He at last understood his pain-a sudden light illumined All at once Pierre felt the sharp stab which this thought dealt relained a lecting of infinite weariness, a sensation of a burning, Arons I ophinists with present the appearant interest and property of the decign then appeared to him instant more more than the decign then appeared to him instant more than the contract of the property of the syect and never-to-he-lorgoften memory of how she had been up for equals, I how oder ode. Seron sid notion bad oder being believe him. And, moreover, would she ever consent to marry a to that which she would have lost. Perhaps, too, she would not quality resident that he was unable to give her a happine section himself, be would look upon himself as Ler murderer were he some odious sacribege, He would afterwards become horning with belief in it, fill it with the ruins which weeked such have in his once nearest to him that the child be of him. What lay hands upon that bitle spotless soul lall all that they might be happy. But a sudden terror took possession along pure Loue of together; they would have the far, in owner word north but, govering string terrestrial sphere, and then they would have shown how life, the only sovereign, worked for health pud conquered once again. And he would have given proofs: he Divinity was but so much illusion! Nature alone had acted, life to return to the Basilica, and cry the truth aloud to Maric. The miracle was a liel. The helpful beneficence of an all-powerful Then rage shook Pierre from head to foot, the was tempted crushing mental torment. He felt a torturing longing to be able to see clearly within himself. Ah! why could he not plunge even more deeply into the heart of things, reflect, understand, and at last calm himself.

And it was a fearful agony that he experienced. He tried to remember all the minutes that had gone by since Marie, suddenly springing from her pallet of wretchedness, had raised her cry of resurrection. Why had he even then, despite his fraternal joy in seeing her erect, felt such an awful sensation of discomfort, as though, indeed, the greatest of all possible misfortunes had fallen upon him? Was he icalous of the divine grace? Did he suffer because the Virgin, whilst healing her, had forgotten him, whose soul was so afflicted? He remembered how he had granted himself a last delay, fixed a supreme appointment with faith for the moment when the Blessed Sacrament should pass by, were Marie only cured; and she was eured, and still he did not believe, and henceforth there was no hope, for never, never would he be able to believe. Therein lay the bare, bleeding sore. The truth hurst upon him with blinding cruelty and certainty-she was saved, That pretended miracle which had restored her to life had, in him, completed the ruin of all belief in the supernatural. That which he had, for a moment, dreamed of seeking, and perhaps finding, at Lourdes-naïve faith, the happy faith of a little child-was no longer possible, would never bloom again after that collapse of the miraculoùs, that cure which Beauclair had foretold, and which had afterwards come to pass, exactly as had been predicted. Jealous! no, he was not jealous, but he was ravaged, full of mortal sadness at thus remaining all alone in the icy desert of his intelligence, regretting the illusion, the lie, the divine love of the simple-minded, for which henceforth there was · no room in his heart.

A flood of bitterness stifled him, and tears started from his eyes. He had slipped on to the flagstones, prostrated by his anguish. And, by degrees, he remembered the whole delightful story, from the day when Marie, guessing how he was tortured by doubt, had hecome so passionately eager for his conversion, taking hold of his hand in the gloom, retaining it in her own, and stammering that she would pray for him—oh! pray for him with her whole soul. She forgot herself, she entreated the Blessed Virgin to save her friend rather than herself if there were but one grace that she could obtain from her Divine Son. Then came another memory, the memory of the delightful hours which they had spent together amid the dense darkness of the trees during the night procession. There, again, they had prayed for one another, mingled one in the other with so ardent a desire for mutual happiness that, for a moment, they had attained to the very depths of the love which gives and immolates itself. And now their long, tear-drenehed tenderness, their pure idyll of suffering, was ending in this brutal separation; she on her side saved, radiant amidst the hosannahs of the trianphant Basilien; and he lost, sobbing with wretehedness, bowed down in the depths of the dark crypt in an icy, gravelike solitude. It was as though he had just lost her again, and this time for ever and for ever.

during the past hour, it was only through this final rending which, ers, had naught of his heing free, save his hrain, in order that he might suffer the more. She had still been his so long as she had not belonged to another; and if he had been enduring such agony children, no doubt. Whereas he, buried, as it were, to his shouldworld was opening before her with smiling happiness, with the love which laught in the sunlit paths, with a husband, with fled away alone, leaving him in the cold grave. The whole wide could not become a man again. Never more would he be able to beautiful, living, and desirable. He, who was dead, hquever, She had all at once appeared to him very strong, very unmow a But beholdt slie was cured. Beholdt slie had become unniow a since she, stricken in her sex by incurable illness, would never be priest, saying to himself that he might well renounce his manhood lost Marie for the first time on the day when he had become a the tertible erisis of woe unidst which he was struggling. his heart. He at last understood his pain-a sudden light illumined All at once Pierre felt the sharp stab which this thought dealt.

relatived a feeling of infinite weariness, a sensation of a burning, healed in ecetary! His design then appeared to him insane, mon-strous, polluting. And his revolt rapidly subsided, until he only the sweet and never-to-be-forgotten memory of how she had been pinest who had broken his vows? She who would always return befieve him. And, moreover, would she ever consent to marry a to that which she would have lost. Perhaps, too, she would not god to realise that he was unable to give her a happiness equal himself, he would look upon himself as her murderer were he some He would afterwards become hornfied with odious sacrilege. own soul? It all at once occurred to him that this nould be belief in it, fill it with the ruins which worked such havoe in his What lay hands upon that little spotless soul, kill all But a sudden terror took possession ting they might be happy. would have gone off together; they would have fled far, far away, And then they unid all the sufferings of this terrestrial sphere. would have shown how life, the only sovereign, worked for health had conquered once again. And he would have given proofs: he Divinity was but so much illusion! Nature alone lad acted, life miracle was a liel The helpful beneficence of an all-powerful to return to the Basilica, and cry the truth aloud to Marie. Then rage shook Pierre from head to foot. He was templed this time, parted her from him for ever and for ever. ineurable wound-the wound of his poor, bruised, and lacerated heart.

Then, however, amidst his abandonment, the void in which he was whirling, a supreme struggle began, filling him again with agony. What should he do? His sufferings made a coward of him, and he would have liked to flee, so that he might never see Marie again. For he understood very well that he would now have to lie to her, since she thought that he was saved like herself, converted, healed in soul, even as she had been healed in body. She had told him of her joy while dragging her ear up the colossal gradient-way. Oh! to have had that great happiness together, together, to have felt their hearts melt and mingle one in the other! And even then he had already lied, as he would always be obliged to lie in order that he might not spoil her pure and blissful illusion. He let the last throbbings of his veins subside, and vowed that he would find sufficient strength for the sublime charity of feigning peacefulness of soul, the rapture of one who is redeemed. For he wished her to be wholly happy-without a regret, without a doubt-in the full serenity of faith, convinced that the Blessed Virgin had indeed given her consent to their purely mystical union. What did his torments matter? Later on, perhaps, he might recover possession of himself. Amidst his desolate solitude of mind would there not always be a little joy to sustain him, all that joy whose consoling falsity he would leave to her?

Several minutes again elapsed, and Pierre, still overwhelmed, remained on the flagstones, seeking to ealm his fever. He no longer thought, he no longer lived; he was a prey to that prostration of the entire being which follows upon great crises. But, all at once, he fancied he could hear a sound of footsteps, and thereupon he painfully rose to his feet, and feigned to be reading the inscriptions graven in the marble votive slabs along the walls. He had been mistaken—nobody was there; nevertheless, seeking to divert his mind, he continued perusing the inscriptions, at first in a mechanical kind of way, and then, little by little, feeling a fresh emotion steal over him.

The sight was almost beyond imagination. Faith, love, and gratitude displayed themselves in a hundred, a thousand ways on these marble slabs with gilded lettering. Some of the inscriptions were so artless as to provoke a smile. A colonel had sent a seulptured representation of his foot with the words: "Thou hast preserved it: grant that it may serve Thee." Farther on you read the line: "May Her protection extend to the glass trade." And then by the frankness of certain expressions of thanks, you realised of what a strange character the appeals had been. "To Marv the Immaeulate," ran one inscription, "from a father of a family, in recognition of health restored, a lawsuit won, and advancement gained." However, the memory of these instances faded away amidst the chorus of soaring, fervent cries. There was the cry of the lovers: "Paul and Anna entreat Our Lady of Londe's to bless their union." There was the cry of the mothers in Antiones bless their union." There was the cry of the mothers in Antionests and all my bin, to the birth of Antoineste, whom I deficate, "Cratitude to Mary for the birth of Antoineste, whom I deficate, "Cratitude to Mary for the birth of Antoineste, whom I deficate ilike myself and all my kin, to Her." "P. D., three years old, has been preserved to the love of the parents." And then came the of the wives, the cry, too, of the sick restored to health, and of the souls restored to happiness: "Protect my husband, grant that my husband may enjoy good health." "I was crippled in both legs, and now I am healed." "We came, and now we hope." "I prayed, I wept, and She heard me." And there were yet oliver cries, eries whose veiled glow conjured up thoughts of long ronautes. "Thou didst join us together; protect us, we pray Thee." "To Mary, for the greatest of all blessings." And the same words—greatitude, thankfulness, hounge, acknowledgment occurred again and again, ever with the same passionale for our Abl those hundreds, those thousands of cries which were for every rose graven on that marble, and from the depths of the crypt rose elamorously to the Virgin, proclaiming the everthasting devotion elamorously to the Virgin, proclaiming the everthasting devotion elamorously to the Virgin, proclaiming the everthasting devotion

Heavent physical and moral verefeltedness, should ever and moral moral it were indeed necessary that such imploting eries, such eries of idea born of the gloomiest pessimism! How evil life must be it harsh belief in the necessity of chadsement What a ferreions quired, and that when the number of these acts of expi tion should be large enough, God would smite France no more. What should be large enough, God would smite France in the state of the to offer to God the acts of expiation which the sins of France remultitude of their prayers. The priests said that it was measured to extort favours and forgiveness by the very multitude, the vast ful were determined to weary the cars of the Divinity, determined docty second was beyond compilitation. It seemed as if the findlight and the starlight processions. But this continual cuttedly of at the Grotto and during the nights spent at the Resary, those said at the ceremonies at the Basilicit, and those said at the samother. He tried to east them up; those said during the days spent he now began to think of the extraordinary number of practice listened to, he alone had been unable to make himself heard! And Pierre did not weary of reading them albeit his mouth was bitter and increasing desolation was filling him. So it was only he who had no succour to hope fort. When so many sufferres were he who had no succour to hope fort. of the unhappy beings whom she had succoured

In the midst of all his sadness Pieure left deep temposion partials heart. He was upset by the thought that mandard the best of mee, so bene, so mee so wretched, reduced to such a state of mee, so bene, so be so wretched, reduced to such a state of mee, so bene, so bene as a consideration of happiness in the hallmen.

incurable wound-the wound of his poor, bruised, and lacerated heart.

Then, however, amidst his abandonment, the void in which he was whirling, a supreme struggle began, filling him again with agony. What should he do? His sufferings made a coward of him, and he would have liked to flee, so that he might never see Marie again. For he understood very well that he would now have to lie to her, since she thought that he was saved like herself, converted, healed in soul, even as she had been healed in body. She had told him of her joy while dragging her car up the eolossal gradient-way. Oh! to have had that great happiness together, together, to have felt their hearts melt and mingle one in the other! And even then he had already lied, as he would always be obliged to lie in order that he might not spoil her pure and blissful illusion. He let the last throbbings of his veins subside, and vowed that he would find sufficient strength for the sublime eharity of feigning peacefulness of soul, the rapture of one who is redeemed. For he wished her to be wholly happy-without a regret, without a doubt-in the full serenity of faith, convinced that the Blessed Virgin had indeed given her consent to their purely mystical union. What did his torments matter? Later on, perhaps, he might recover possession of himself. Amidst his desolate solitude of mind would there not always be a little joy to sustain him, all that joy whose eonsoling falsity he would leave to her?

Several minutes again elapsed, and Pierre, still overwhelmed, remained on the flagstones, seeking to ealm his fever. He no longer thought, he no longer lived; he was a prey to that prostration of the entire being which follows upon great erises. But, all at once, he fancied he could hear a sound of footsteps, and thereupon he painfully rose to his fect, and feigned to be reading the inscriptions graven in the marble votive slabs along the walls. He had been mistaken—nobody was there; nevertheless, seeking to divert his mind, he continued perusing the inscriptions, at first in a mechanical kind of way, and then, little by little, feeling a fresh cmotion steal over him.

The sight was almost beyond imagination. Faith, love, and gratitude displayed themselves in a hundred, a thousand ways on these marble slabs with gilded lettering. Some of the inscriptions were so artless as to provoke a smile. A colonel had sent a sculptured representation of his foot with the words: "Thou hast prescrued it: grant that it may serve Thee." Farther on vou read the line: "May Her protection extend to the glass trade." And then, by the frankness of certain expressions of thanks, you realised of what a strange character the appeals had been. "To Mary the Immaeulate," ran one inscription, "from a father of a family, in recognition of health restored, a lawsuit won, and advancement gained." However, the memory of these instances faded away amidst the chorus of soaring, fervent eries. There was the cry and for others, for all the poor tortured beings who feel a need of stupefying and numbing their pains in order to escape from the realities of the world. He again seemed to hear the swarming, kneeling crowd of the Grotto, raising the glowing entreaty of its prayer to Heaven, the multitude of twenty and thirty thousand souls from whose midst ascended such a fervour of desire that you seemed to see it smoking in the sunlight like incense. another form of the exaltation of faith glowed, beneath the crypt in the Church of the Rosary, where nights were spent in a paradise of rapture, amidst the silent delights of the communion, the mute appeals in which the whole being pines, burns, and soars aloft. And as though the eries raised before the Grotto and the perpetual adoration of the Rosary were not sufficient, that clamour of ardent entreaty burst forth afresh on the walls of the crypt around him; and here it was eternised in marble, here it would continue shrieking the sufferings of humanity even into the far-away ages. It was the marble, it was the walls themselves praying, seized by that great shudder of universal woe which penetrated even the stones. And, at last, the prayers ascended yet higher, still higher, soared aloft from the radiant Basilica, which was humming and buzzing above him, full as it now was of a frantic multitude, whose mighty voice, bursting into a canticle of hope, he fancied he could hear through the flagstones of the nave. And it finally seemed to him that he was being whirled away, transported, as though he were indeed amidst the very vibrations of that huge wave of prayer, which, starting from the dust of the earth, ascended the tier of superposed ehurches, spreading from tabernacle to tabernacle, and filling even their walls with such pity that they sobbed aloud, and that the supreme cry of wretchedness pierced its way into Heaven with the white spire, the lofty golden cross, above the steeple. O Almighty God O Divinity, Helpful Power, whoever, whatever Thou mayst be, take pity upon poor mankind and make human suffering cease!

All at once Pierre was dazzled. He had followed the left-hand passage, and was coming out into broad daylight, above the inclined ways, and two affectionate arms at once caught hold of him and clasped him. It was Doetor Chassaigne, whose appointment he had forgotten, and who had been waiting there to take him to visit Bernadette's room and Abbé Peyramale's church. "Oh! what joy must be yours my child," exclaimed the good old man. "I have just learnt the great news, the extraordinary favour which Our Lady of Lourdes has granted to your young friend. Recollect what I told you the day before yesterday. I am now at case—you are saved!"

A last bitterness came to the young priest, who was very pale. However, he was able to smile, and he gently answered: "Yes, we are saved, we are very happy."

to mount, which, in rainy weather, was immersed in the water of the gutter.

"Go in, my friend, go in," said the doctor. "You have only to push the gate."

The passage was long, and Pierre kept on feeling the damp wall with his hand, for fear of making a false step. It seemed to him as if he were descending into a cellar, in deep obscurity, and he could feel a slippery soil impregnated with water beneath his feet. Then at the end, in obedience to the doctor's direction, he turned to the right.

"Stoop, or you may hurt yourself," said M. Chassaigne; "the door is very low. There, here we are.'

The door of the room, like the gate in the street, stood wide open, as if the place had been earelessly abandoned; and Pierre, who had stopped in the middle of the chamber, hesitating, his eyes still full of the bright daylight outside, could distinguish absolutely nothing. He had fallen into complete darkness, and felt an iey chill about the shoulders similar to the sensation that might be caused by a wet towel.

But, little by little, his eyes became more accustomed to the dimness. Two windows of unequal size opened on to a narrow interior courtyard, where only a greenish light descended, as at the bottom of a well; and to read there, in the middle of the day, it would be necessary to have a candle. Measuring about fifteen feet by twelve, the room was flagged with large uneven stones; while the principal beam and the rafters of the roof, which were visible, had darkened with time and assumed a dirty, sooty Opposite the door was the ehimney, a miserable plaster chimney, with a mantelpiece formed of a rotten old plank. There was a sink between this chimney and one of the windows. The walls, with their decaying plaster falling off by bits, were stained with damp, full of eracks, and turning a dirty black like the eciling. There was no longer any furniture there; the room seemed abandoned; you could only eateh a glimpse of some confused, strange objects, unrecognisable in the heavy obscurity that hung about the corners.

After a spell of silence, the doctor exclaimed: "Yes, this is the room; all came from here. Nothing has been changed, with the exception that the furniture has gone. I have tried to picture how it was placed; the beds certainly stood against this wall, opposite the windows; there must have been three of them at least, for the Soubirous were seven—the father mother, two boys, and three girls. Think of that! Three beds filling this room! Seven persons living in this small space! All of them buried alive, without air, without light, almost without bread! What frightful misery! What lowly, pity-awaking poverty!"

But he was interrupted. A shadowy form, which Pierre at first took for an old woman, entered. It was a priest, however, the acquainted with the doctor. carate of the parish, who now occupied the house.

"I heard your voice, Monsiour Chassagne, and came down,"

"Just so, Monsieur l'Abbér I took the liberty It does not in-"So there you are showing the room again?"

convenience you?"

"Ohl not at all, not at all. Come as often as you please, and hring other people."

astonished by this quiet carelessuess, observed: "The people who He laughed in an engaging manner, and bowed to Pierre, who, come, however, must sometimes plague you?"

but days and days often pass without my hearto be warried. remains over there at the Grotto. I leave the door open so as not Mobady comes. You see the place is searcely known. Every one Ind cod, nat The enrate, in his turn, seemed surprised.

germing jo punos off nove gain ratters, moreover, were some provisions, a salad basket full of away and thrown to the bottom of cellars. Hanging from the at towl eages and broken tools, a lot of rubbish such as is swept the comers he ended by distinguishing some old barrels, remnants opsentify and among the vague, perplexing objects which filled there's eyes were becoming more and more accustomed to the

"you have thought that you might make use of the room?" eggs, and several bunches of big pink onions. And, from what I see, reanined Pierre, with a slight shudder, in dured work fittle space. And then you can't interior bow damp it is that's it," said he. "What can one do? The bruse is so small, I The curate was beginning to feel incomfortable. "Of course, ूर्वाइक् uwo हुने॥० क्रं द्वीएम् Dieu, little by little all this has necommlated here by itself, conhere; it is altogether impossible to occupy the room. And so, mon

"It has become a lumber-room," concluded Pierre.

Honor-roduml a si it in moster room!" "Oh not hardly that, An unoccupied room, and yet in truth, spineral to enwor mount tend out to one of this bloom reflect that you owe everything to Bernadette; but for ber Laurde & med: "You must excuse me, Monsieur PAbbé, if I incist. But had human ingratifude. Pierre, unable to restrain himself, was conismiled, and was visibly delighted at his companion arm but against Doctor Chassagne remained sheat and did not mertere, but he His measiness was increasing mingled with a fulle shane.

"Ohl a chapell" interrupted the carate. to have transformed this wretched room into a chereally it seems to me that out of mere granude the parish eacht

of a human creature; the Church could not ma

ed by the piety of the inhabitants and the pilgrims. In a word, I should like some little show of affection-a touching souvenir, a picture of Bernadette-something that would delicately indicate that she ought to have a place in all hearts. This forgetfulness and desertion are shocking. It is monstrous that so much dirt should have been allowed to accumulate!"

The curate, a poor thoughtless, nervous man, at once adopted Pierre's views: "In reality, you are a thousand times right," said he; "but I myself have no power, I can do nothing. Whenever they ask me for the room, to set it to rights, I will give it up and remove my barrels, although I really don't know where else to put them. Only, I repeat, it does not depend on me. I can do nothing, nothing at all!" Then, under the pretext that he had to go out, he hastened to take leave and run away again, saying to Doetor Chassaigne: "Remain, remain as long as you please; you are never in my way."

in my way.

When the doctor once more found himself alone with Pierre he caught hold of both his hands with effusive delight. "Ah, my dear child," said he, "how pleased you have made mel How admirably you expressed to him all that has been boiling in my own heart so long! Like you, I thought of bringing some roses here every morning. I should have simply had the room eleaned, and would have contented myself with placing two large bunches of roses on the mantelpiece; for you know that I have long fell deep affection for Bernadette, and it seemed to me that those roses would be like the very flowering and perfume of her memory. Only-only-" and so saying he made a despairing gesture "only courage failed me. Yes, I say courage, no one having yet dared to declare himself openly against the Fathers of the Grotto. One hesitates and recoils in the fear of stirring up a religious scandal. Fancy what a deplorable racket all this would create. those who are as indignant as I am are reduced to the necessity of holding their tongues and preferring a continuance of silence to anything else." Then, by way of conclusion, he added: "The ingratitude and rapacity of man, my dear child, are sad things to see. Each time I come here, into this dim wretchedness, my heart swells and I cannot restrain my tears."

He ceased speaking, and neither of them said another word, both being overcome by the extreme melancholy which the surroundings fostered. They were steeped in gloom. The dampness made them shudder as they stood there amidst the dilapidated walls and the dust of the old rubbish piled up on either side. And the idea returned to them that without Bernadette none of the prodigies which had made Lourdes a town unique in the world would have existed. It was at her voice that the miraculous spring had gushed forth, that the Grotto, bright with candles, had opened. Immense works were executed, new churches rose from the ground, giant-like causeways led up to God. An entire new city viz built, as if by enchantment, with its gardens, walks, quays, ridges, shops, and hotels. And people from the uttermost parts of the earth flocked thither in crowds, and the rain of millions fell with such force and so abundantly that the young eity seemed likely to increase indefinitely—to fill the whole valley, from one to the other end of the mountains. If Bernadette had been suppressed none of those things would have existed, the extraordinary tory would have relapsed into nothingness, old unknown Lourdes to castle. Bernadette was the sole labourer and creatress; and se castle. Bernadette was the sole labourer and ereatress; and etchis toon, whence she had set out on the day she beheld the ous fortune of the town, was disdained, left a prey to vermin, ous fortune of the town, was disdained, left a prey to vermin, and only for a lumber-room, where onions and empty barrels good only for a lumber-room, where onions and empty barrels

MAKELETER DOME OF CETERNOMICS. harvesis, reaped by the workinen of the last hour amidst the hundle seed which over yonder was now yielding such prodigious and left in darkness-that manger where had germed the little one now followed in her footsteps. The manger was forgotten, flower so prettily in a vision like those of the legends. was again to be born within her in the broad daylight and to whole family was fast asleep. It was thence, too, that she had set out, unconsciously earrying along with her that dream, which her two sisters, and seized with a fit of her ailment while the as they might visit a station of glory. It was there that the poor child had begun her dream, one cold night, lying in bed between of this snot of misery, which the processions ought to have visited plank serving as a mantelshelf. The clergy ignored the existence luen to reduce to dust, hetween their fingers, the half-rotten pilgrims had done in their desire to earry away a souvenir had came thither, none knelt or prayed. All that a few tender-hearted Of the infrequent visitors who a taper, not a hymn, not a flower. Here, at the eradle, in this dark icy hole, there was not a soul, not in procession. All the noise, all the brightness, all the adoration, in procession. All the noise, all the prightness, all the adoration, inined by a vast number of candles, where nations marched past the torrent: it was a chapel, adorned and enriched, a chapel illufore which the child had formerly knelt on the deserted bank of .. shone out before him. It was no longer the wild, rocky cavity beunidst the clamour of the multitude. But the Grotto especially witnessed, the exaltation of the Crotto and Basiliea, while Marie, nind, and he again scemed to see the triumph which he had just Then the other side of the question vividly appeared in Pierre's were put away.

Pierre, whom the great human emotion of the story moved to tears, at last summed up his thoughts in three words, saying in a low toice: "It is Bethlehem."

"Yes," remarked Doctor Chassaigne in his turn, "it is the wretched lodging, the chance refuge, where new religions are born of suffering and pity. And at times I ask myself if all is not better thus: if it is not better that this room should remain in its actual state of wretchedness and abandonment. It seems to me that Bernadette has nothing to lose by it, for I love her all the more when I come to spend an hour here."

He again became silent, and then made a gesture of revolt: "But no, no! I cannot forgive it—this ingratitude sets me beside myself. I told you I was convineed that Bernadette had freely gone to eloister herself at Nevers. But although no one smuggled her away, what a relief it was for those whom she had begun to inconvenience here! And they are the same men, so anxious to be the absolute masters, who at the present time endeavour by all possible means to drap her memory in silence. Ah! my dear child, if I were to tell you all!"

Little by little he spoke out and relieved himself. Those Fathers of the Grotto, who showed such greed in trading on the work of Bernadette, dreaded her still more now that she was dead than they had done whilst she was alive. So long as she had lived their great terror had assuredly been that she might return to Lourdes to elaim a portion of the spoil; and her humility alone reassured them, for she was in nowise of a domineering disposition, and had herself chosen the dim abode of renunciation where she was destined to pass away. But at present their fears had increased at the idea that a will other than theirs might bring the relics of the visionary back to Lourdes; that thought had, indeed, occurred to the municipal council immediately after her death; the town had wished to raise a tomb, and there had been a talk of opening a subscription. The Sisters of Nevers, however, formally refused to give up the body, which they said belonged to them. Everyone felt that the Sisters were acting under the influence of the Fathers, who were very uneasy, and energetically bestirring themselves to prevent by all means in their power the return of those venerated ashes, in whose presence at Lourdes they foresaw a possible competition with the Grotto itself. Could they have imagined some such threatening occurrence as this-a monumental tomb in the eemetery, pilgrims proceeding thither in procession, the sick feverishly kissing the marble, and miraeles being worked there amidst a holy fervour? This would have been disastrous rivalry, a certain displacement of all the present devotion and prodigies. And the great, the sole fear, still and ever returned to them, that of having to divide the spoils, of seeing the money go elsewhere should the town, now taught by experience, know how to turn the tomb to account.

The Fathers were even eredited with a seheme of profound craftiness. They were supposed to have the seeret idea of reserving Bernadette's remains for themselves; the Sisters of Nevers not bring it back until the alluence of the pilgrins should decrease. What was the use of a solemn return at present, when crowds locked to the place without interruption and in increasing numbers, whereas, when the extraordinary success of Our Lady of Lourdes should decline, like everything else in this world, one could imagine what a reawakening of faith would attend the counters should decline, like everything else in this world, one could imagine what a reawakening of faith would attend the founds in again on the chosen one take possession of the soil whence she had made so many marvels spring. And the miracles would behold their relies of the chosen one take possession of the soil whence she had made so many marvels spring. And the miracles would behold then the relies of the chosen one take possession of the crotte or in the had made so many marvels spring. And the miracles would behold then the Basilica.

Tall

"You may search," continued Doctor Chassaigne, "but you "You may search," continued Doctor Chassaigne, "but you having simply undertaken to keep it for them within the peaceful precincts of their chapel. Only, they were waiting, and would won't find a single official picture of Bernadette at Lourdes.

portrait is sold, but it is hung nowhere, in no sanctuary. It is systematic forgetfulness, the same sentiment of covert uncasiness as that which has wonght silence and abandonment in this sad as that which has wonght silence and abandonment in this sad chainmost where we are, in the same way as they are afraid of worship at her tomb, so are they alraid of crowds coning and kneeting here, should two candles burn or a couple of bouquets of rose bloom upon this chimney. And if a paralytic woman were to rise shouting that she was cured, what a scandal would arise, to rise shouting that she was cured, what a scandal would arise, how disturbed would be those traders of the Crotto on seeing their monopoly scriously threatened! They are the masters, and their masters they intend to remain; they will not part with any working. Nevertheless they tremble at the memory of the mognificent farm that they tremble at the memory of the workers of the first hour, of that little girl who is memory of the workers of the first hour, of that little girl who is still so great in death, and for whose huge inhertiance they burn still so great in death, and for whose huge inhertiance they burn with such greed that after having sent her to live at Nevers, they

Just then, before leaving the room, Doetor Chassaigne exclaimed; "And it's here that one must believe, my dear child. Do you see this obscure hole, do you think of the resplendent Grotto, of the triumphant Basilica, of the town built, of the world created, the crowds that flock to Lourdes! And if Bernadette was only hallucinated, only an idiot, would not the outcome be more astonishing, more inexplicable still? What! An idiot's dream would have sufficed to stir up nations like this! No! no! The Divine breath which alone can explain prodigies passed here."

Pierre was on point of hastily replying: "Yes!" It was true, a breath had passed there, the sob of sorrow, the inextinguishable yearning towards the infinite of hope. If the dream of a suffering child had sufficed to attract multitudes, to bring about a rain of millions and raise a new city from the soil, was it not because this dream in a measure appeased the hunger of poor mankind, its insatiable need of being deceived and consoled? She had once more opened the Unknown, doubtless at a favourable moment both socially and historically; and the crowds had rushed towards Ohl to take refuge in mystery, when reality is so hard, to abandon oneself to the miraculous, since cruel nature seems merely one long injustice! But although you may organise the Unknown, reduce it to dogmas, make revealed religions of it, there is never anything at the bottom of it beyond the appeal of suffering, the cry of life, demanding health, joy, and fraternal happiness, and ready to accept them in another world if they cannot be had on earth. What use is it to believe in dogmas? Does it not suffice to weep and love?

Pierre, however, did not discuss the guestion. He withheld the answer that was on his lips, convinced, moreover, that the eternal need of the supernatural would cause eternal faith to ahide among sorrowing mankind. The miracles, which could not be verified. must be a food necessary to human despair. Besides, had he not vowed in all charity that he would not wound any one with his doubts?

"What a prodigy, isn't it?" repeated the doctor.

"Certainly!" Pierre ended by answering. "The whole human drama has been played, all the unknown forces have acted in this poor room, so damp and dark."

They remained there a few minutes more in silence; they walked round the walls, raised their eyes towards the smoky eeiling, and east a final glance at the narrow greenish yard. Truly it was a heartrending sight, this poverty of the cobweb level, with its dirty old barrels, its worn-out tools, its refuse of all kinds rotting in the corners in heaps. And without adding a word they at last slowly retired, feeling extremely sad.

It was only in the street that Doctor Chassaigne seemed to awaken. He gave a slight shudder and hastened his steps, saying: "It is not finished, my dear child; follow me. We are now going to look at the other great iniquity." He referred to Abbé Peyra-

he experienced a restless delight in hurrying on the work, with he was at bottom, a pastor of the multitude, a builder of temples, desire of the Blessed Virgin. Man of authority and domination as would conduct endless processions in compliance with the formal where he would triumph in his sacred vestments, and whence he brotestation, his own share of the glory, the House of the Lord work of Our Lady of Lourdes, of which he, with Bernadette, had Since he had been dispossessed of the Crotto, driven from the this monumental edifice filled the last year of the Cue's life! With what a glorious dream had to the wind and to the rain. of his church, which he had left unfinished, without a roof, open after thus killing him by grief, they had completed the destruction in consequence, overcome by feelings of frightful bittemess; and, Cure of Lourdes. The latter had been vanquished, and had died terrible, merciless war waged by Father Sempe against the former. sation had again fallen on the Fathers of the Crotto, on the Saint Pierre; a few minutes would suffice them. But their conver-They crossed the Place du Porche and turned into the Rue male and his church.

then he returned, never tiring of his contemplation of that regal: stood the vestry building with its two rows of little windows; and tound the building he skirted the semi-circular apse against which windows of the transept, whose roses were sparkling; and passing real pariotos fient of ore the great coloured all adormments than archivanlts with mouldings, rising above the the same way the apertures in the nisles and nave had no other the entablature, which was decorated with simple mouldings. noots of the nave, transcopt, and apse were of equal height above ture, not an ornament that would have uselessly leaded it. The ' charmed with its mulity, its supendous candour, its charteness recalling that of a virgin child, for there was not a piece of sculp-Perioci regularity. And, in thought, he sauntered around it, smart in its newness, with its broad courses of stone disposed with treed on the previous day of the last scalfolding, and looking quite with feet high. It shone out resplendently in the clear sunlight. maye nearly three hundred feet long, its steeple four hundred and it should be in the Romanesque style, very large, very sumple, its square, at last rose in all its colossal majesty. He had decided that telt himself to be enveloped. His church, towering above the vast Aringgle, amidet the underhand murderous designs by which he summer morning, all new in the rising sun. thus he saw his church rise up, and pictured it finished, one bright, always had a swarm of workmen busy on the scaffoldings. And ness to trouble him, but was perfectly contented so long us he the lack of foresight of an eager man who did not allow indebtedordonnance, those great lines standing out against the blue sky, those superposed roofs, that enormous mass of stone, whose solidity promised to defy centuries. But, when he closed his eyes. he, above all else conjured up, with rapturous pride, a vision of the façade and steeple; down below, the three portals, the roofs of the two lateral ones forming terraces, while from the central one, in the very middle of the façade, the steeple boldly sprang. Here again columns resting on piers supported archivanits with simple mouldings. Against the gable, at a point where there was a pinnaele, and between the two lofty windows lighting the nave, was a statue of Our Lady of Lourdes under a eanopy. Up above were other bays with freshly painted luffer-boards. started from the ground at the four corners of the steeple-base, becoming less and less massive from storey to storey, till they reached the spire, a bold tapering spire in stone, flanked by four turrets and adorned with pinnacles, and soaring upward till it vanished in the sky. And to the parish priest of Lourdes it seemed as if it were his own fervent soul which had grown and flown aloft with this spire, to testify to his faith throughout the ages, there on high, quite close to God.

At other times another vision delighted him still more. thought he could see the inside of his church on the day of the first solemn mass he would perform there. The coloured windows threw flashes of fire brilliant like precious stones, the twelve chapels, the aisles, were beaming with lighted candles. And he was at the high altar of marble and gold, and the fourteen columns of the nave in single blocks of Pyrenean marble, magnificent gifts purchased with money that had come from the four corners of Christendom, rose up supporting the vaulted roof, while the sonorous voices of the organs filled the whole building with a hymn of joy. A multitude of the faithful was gathered there, kneeling on the flags in front of the choir, which was serecned by ironwork as deliente as lace, and covered with admirably earved wood. The pulpit, the regal present of a great ladv. was a marvel of art cut in massive oak. The baptismal fonts had been hewn out of hard stone by an artist of great talent. Pietures by masters ornamented the walls. Crosses, pyxes, precious monstranees, sacred vestments, similar to suns, were piled up in the vestry cupboards. And what a dream it was to be the pontiff of such a temple, to reign there after having erected it with passion, to bless the crowds who hastened to it from the entire earth, while the flying peals from the steeple told the Grotto and Basilica that they had over there, in old Lourdes, a rival, a victorious sister, in whose great nave God triumphed alsol

After following the Rue Saint Pierre for a moment, Doetor Chassaigne and his companion turned into the little Rue de Langelle. "We are coming to it," said the doctor. But though Pierre looked around him he could see no church. There were merely lamentable woefulness of the young ruin was displayed to their gaze. On this side, indeed, the works had not been carried forward to anything like the same extent: the porch with its three portals alone was built, and fifteen years of abandonment had sufficed for the winter weather to eat into the sculptures, the small columns and the archivaults, with a really singular destructive effect, as though the stones, deeply penetrated, destroyed, had melted away beneath tears. The heart grieved at the sight of the decay which had attacked the work before it was even finished. Not yet to be, and nevertheless to crumble away in this fashion under the sky! To be arrested in one's colosal growth, and simply strew the weeds with mins!

They returned to the nave, and were overcome by the frightful sadness which this assassination of a monument provoked. spacious plot of waste ground inside was littered with the remains of scaffoldings, which had been pulled down when half-rotten, in fear lest their fall might crush people; and everywhere amids the tall grass were boards, putlogs, moulds for arches, mingled with bundles of old cord eaten away by damp. There was also the long narrow carcase of a crane rising up like a gibbet. Spacehandles, pieces of broken wheel-barrows, and heaps of greenish bricks, speckled with moss and wild convolvali in bloom were still lying about among the forgotten materials. In the beds of nettles you here and there distinguished the rails of a little railway laid down for the trucks, one of which was lying overturned in a comer. But the saddest sight in all this death of things was certainly the portable engine which had remained in the shed that sheltered it. For fifteen years it had been standing there cold and lifeless. A part of the roof of the shed had ended by falling in upon it, and now the rain drenched it through great holes at every shower. A bit of the leather harness by which the craze was worked hung down, and seemed to bind it like a thread of some gigantic spider's web. And its metal-work, its steel and copper, was also decaying, as it rusted by lichens, covered with the vegetation of old age, whose yellowish patches made it look like a very ancient, grass-grown machine which the winters had This lifeless engine, this cold engine with its empty firebox and its silent boiler, was like the very soul of the deputed labour vainly awaiting the advent of some great charitable heart, whose coming through the eglantine and the brambles would awaken this sleeping church in the wood from its heavy slumber of rain.

At last Doctor Chassigne spoke: "Ah!" he said, "when one thinks that fifty thousand francs would have sufficed to prevent such a disaster! With fifty thousand francs the roof could have been put on, the heavy work would have been saved, and one could have waited patiently. But they wanted to kill the work just his they had killed the man." With a gesture he designated

e Fathers of the Crotto, whom he avoided maming. "And to ink," he continued, "that their annual receipts are eight hundred mak," he continued. "A 32,000). However, they prefer to send meaning to Bears (£ 32,000). However, they prefer to send

In spite of himself, he was again opening hostilities against or adversaries of Curé Peyramale. The whole story caused a holy near of justice to haunt him. Face to face with those famentable nger of justice to haunt him. Face to face with those famentable ints, he returned to the facts—the enthusiastic Curé starting on his beloved church, and getting deeper and deeper deeper of chulding of his beloved church, and getting deeper and deeper and deeper and deeper and deeper and deeper and deeper of deeper and deaper gent whilst Father Sempé, ever on the look-out, took advantage of each of his mistakes, discrediting him with the bishop, aresting the conquered man was dead, had come interminable awaints, lawanits lasting fifteen years, which gave the winters awaints, lawanits lasting fifteen years, which gave the winters awaint, the building. And now it was in such a woeful inter the building. And now it was in such a woeful that of devour the building. And now it was in such a woeful state, ind the debt had risen to such of the stones, was becomeranced over. The sow death, the death of the stones, was becomerant and process, pounded by the rain and enten away by the would fall to pieces, pounded by the rain and enten away by the

and Basilica cost them three millious of france (£ 120,000)." sedness, this frightful wretchedness! Over yonder the Rosary he pointed to all the devastation surrounding him, "Look at this of the nave, united the ruins, and with a sweeping wave of the arm Walking slowly, he had while speaking returned to the middle nave opened shop there and sell God there wholesale and retail!" keeping them away. They only tolerate the female Orders, and will only have one flock. And the town belongs to them; they times, and the Fathers of the Crotto have always succeeded in Capuchins, and Carmelites have made applications at various attempted to come to Lourdes. Jesuits, Dominicans, Benedictines, even made them intrigue against the religious Orders that have selves alone. I may tell you that their terror of competition has the absolute masters, to have all the power, all the money for themthat they alone remain. It is just what they wanted-to be "I know very well that they chant victory," resumed the doctor;

Then, as in Bernadette's cold, dark room, Pierre saw the Basilera rise before him, radiant in its triumph. It was not here that you found the realisation of the dream of Curé Peyrannale, officiating and blessing reconnditiones, while the organs resonnded joyfully. The Basilica, over yonder, uppeared vibrating with the pealing of its bells, elamorous with the superhuman joy of accomplished miracle, all sparkling with its countless hights, i accomplished miracle, all sparkling with its countless hights, in pold, and its monstrance akin to a golden star. It flanged in paners, its lamps, its hearts of silver and gold, its clergy aftire beauers, its lamps, its hearts of silver and gold, its clergy aftire in cold, and its monstrance akin to a golden star. It flanged it the solding sun, it touched the beavers which caused its maids to the soaring of the milliards of prayers which caused its walls to quiver. Here, however, we dear the indinates the caused its walls to being born, the church placed under interdict by a mandamus of the Bishop, the church falling into, dust, and open to the four winds of heaven. Each storm carried away a little more of the stones, big flies buzzed all alone among the nettles which had invaded the nave; and there were no other devotees there than the poor women of the neighbourhood, who came to turn their sorry linen, spread upon the grass.

It seemed amidst the mournful silence as though a low voice were sobbing, perhaps the voice of the marble columns weeping over their useless beauty under their wooden shirts. At times birds would fly across the deserted apsc uttering a shrill cry. . . Bands of enormous rats which had taken refuge under bits of the lowered scaffoldings would fight, and bite and bound out of their holes in a gallop of terror. And nothing could have been more heartrending than the sight of this predetermined ruin, face to face with its triumphant rival, the Basilica, which beamed with gold.

Again Doetor Chassaigne eurtly said "Come."

They left the church, and following the left aisle, reached a door, roughly fashioned out of a few planks nailed together; and, when they had passed down a half-demolished wooden staircase, the steps of which shook beneath their feet, they found them-sclves in the crypt.

It was a low vault, with squat arches, on exactly the same plan as the choir. The thick, stunted columns, left in the rough, also awaited their seulptors. Materials were lying about, pieces of wood were rotting on the beaten ground, the whole vast hall was white with plaster in the disorderly abandonment in which unfinished buildings are left. At the far end, three bays, formerly glazed, but in which not a pane of glass remained, threw a clear, cold light upon the desolate bareness of the walls.

And there, in the middle, lay Curé Peyramale's corpse. Some pious friends had conceived the touching idea of thus burying him in the crypt of his unfinished church. The tomb stood on a broad step and was all marble. The inscriptions, in letters of gold, expressed the feelings of the subscribers, the cry of truth and reparation that came from the monument itself. You read on the face: "This tomb has been erected by the aid of pious offcrings from the entire universe to the blessed memory of the great servant of Our Lady of Lourdes." On the right side were these words from a Brief of Pope Pius IX.: "You have entirely devoted yourself to erecting a temple to the Mother of God." And on the left were these words from the New Testament; "Happy are they who suffer persecution for justice' sake." Did not these inscriptions embody the true plaint, the legitimate hope of the vanquished man who had fought so long in the sole desire of strictly executing the commands of the Virgin as transmitted to him by Bernadette? She, Our Lady of Lourdes, was there the faithful who desired to sit down. tomb, as before the Grotto, were five or six benches in rows, for were a few bead wreaths hanging from nails. And before the rative inscription, against the naked wall whose only decorations personified by a slender stainette, standing above the commenso-could not restrain a groun. "Now it rains," he said; " it rains on large regular thylunical drops upon the tomb. The doctor their their vals then y rain. And they both tell a part their their vals they perceived that the valet was their thing in their they perceived that the valet was tabling in commenced, a perfect stream ran down, incading the crypt, Although but the storm of the previous night. Infiltration had evidently released coment flooring of the choir-quite, a quantity of graver ant no evode qu bestion bal et deithe estal etitle et beredungues which was broning the wall at the far end quite green. Pierrie Chassaigne had silently pointed out to Pierre a luge damp-sixe but with another gesture of somowful compassion, Doctor toot Suiting but 24 Para start of 1940 gainblew sew oil 2949 books has aband tie building, was crumbling about his head and tot with pipe? the timbers for the root all beloved the best of the section १ वह वह वह वह राज्याच्या पूर्वी इतिहासित राज्या के पित्र आएएउने वह नामहात more along the walls. He was waiting, too, for the newsorted the said to the property of all parting many to be seen all yell but, the said that the said to the sa and an addothese notion out tol guilling rest off. Alike would be there, and it it should take them a comme, by a sold If they should take ten years to do so b fac April morning. ness, avaited the working it who would perhaps return thither some all eternity before him to acquire patience, there, without wearnexpectation also. Cure Peyramale, stretched in his collin, harmaof night. It was the mute, obstinate, eternal protest, and it was dreamer watching over the empty spaces, open to all the back It was the softeny guardian, the dead sheper and all the rubbish, at the bottom of the crumbing mins of its own appeared to him both woeful and tragic. It acquired a fierce grandent, hing there alone in its splendid marble tomb, amidst rush at winter time through the glassless windows, that corpse State fulfing where in the thought of the black which are remarked of of hinds of the Coole vers in a dutil a weather of the Coole of the Co of high and been decreased all to luce all bearings but all of the and some states and or one fact the fact of the sound that the fact of the fac pions hands lead kept a little Lamp burrang below it his touch There and termerity have a bust of the Court and a touch a touch and a touch a touch a touch and a touch and a touch a t ifter persecuting Outé Peyranale and bar vid tale pervented In a low voice, the doctor finished the crack story to that had take place there? The sick already passed entire days there, seated on the benches before the tomb. Others knelt down, kissed the marble and prayed to be cured. And at this a feeling of terror arose; supposing they should be cured, supposing the Grotto should find a competitor in this martyr, lying all alone, amidst the old tools left there by the masons! The Bishop of Tarbes, informed and influenced, thereupon published the mandamus which placed the church under interdict, forbidding all worship there and all pilgrimages and processions to the tomb of the former priest of Lourdes. As in the case of Bernadette, his memory was proscribed, his portrait could be found officially nowhere. In the same manner as they had shown themselves merciless against the living man, so did the Fathers prove merciless to his memory. They pursued him even in his tomb. They alone, again nowadays, prevented the works of the church from being proceeded with, by raising continual obstacles, and absolutely refusing to share their rich harvest of alms. And they seemed to be waiting for the winter rains to fall and complete the work of destruction, for the vaulted roof of the crypt, the walls, the whole gigantic pile to crumble down upon the tomb of the martyr, upon the body of the defeated man, so that he might be buried beneath them and at last pounded to dust.

"Ah!" murmured the doctor, "I, who knew him so valiant, so enthusiastic in all noble labour! Now, you see it, it rains, it rains

Plainfully, he set himself on his knees and found relicf in a long prayer.

Pierre, who could not pray, remained standing. Compassionate sorrow was overflowing from his heart. He listened to the heavy drops from the roof as one by one they broke on the tomb with a slow rhythmical pit-a-pat, which seemed to be numbering the seconds of eternity, amidst the profound silence. And he reflected on the cternal misery of this world, on the choice which suffering makes in always falling on the best. The two great makers of Our Lady of Lourdes, Bernadette, and Curé Peyramale, rose up in the flesh again before him, like woeful victims, tortured during their lives and exiled after their deaths. That alone, indeed, would have completed within him the destruction of his faith; for the Bernadette whom he had just found at the end of his researches was but a human sister, loaded with every dolour. But none the less he preserved a tender brotherly veneration for her, and two tears slowly trickled down his cheeks.

there, the only sound he could distinguish was the tender caresplace in it. But although he listened very attentively when he got

THE LILLH DYK

ECOLISM YND FONE

I

might be realised. psecifics and so hare-brained, everything was possible, every fear With a man like M, de Cuersaine, so pleasantly in the morning. be if her father were not there to embrace her the first thing him at Cavarnies and he thought how disappointed Marie would byutilob bud vonchoding some inischance had detained had been soundly enjoying the delicious, restoring sleep of a child, he had gone to bed himself feeling anxious at the proponged absence of M. de Guersaint. He had expected him at unable to obtain a wink of sleep. After calling at the Hospital to inquire after Marie, who, since her return from the procession, Achia that night Pierre, at the Hotel of the Apparitions, was room, as he felt certain that some deeds of violence were tak as fambed from his bed, wishing to explore his absent from boding occurrences were leading into adventures? At one nomera he the young single woman on his right, whom some meenprehensiele or was it rather the larger family, or the single gentleman, or married couple on his left, who were fighting with the furniture? it the priest, the mother and her three daughters, or the old passage, amid which he could distinguish nothing precisely: no coniq only pear the extraordinary sounds of some minutes he would listen feverishly, returned. 10.1 and continually rose up, beset with the idea that the noise he in spite of his great fatigue; but afterwards the nochmal noises of the hotel had really assumed unbearable proportions. The morrow, Truesday, was the day of departure, the last day which Perhaps this auxiety had at first sufficed to keep Pierre awake sing murmurs of two voices. Then a sudden recollection of Madame Volmar came to him, and he returned shuddering to bed.

At length, when it was broad daylight and Pierre had just fallen asleep, a loud knocking at his door awoke him with a start. This time there could be no mistake, a loud voice broken by sobs was calling: "Monsieur l'Abbél Monsieur l'Abbél for Heaven's sake wake up!"

Surely it must be M. de Guersaint who had been brought back dead, at least. Quite seared, Pierre ran and opened the door in his night-shirt, and found himself in the presence of his neighbour, M. Vigneron.

"Ohl for Heaven's sake, Monsieur l'Abbé, dress yourself at oncel" exclaimed the assistant head-clerk. "Your holy ministry is required." And he began to relate that he had just got up to see the time by his watch on the mantelpiece, when he had heard some most frightful sighs issuing from the adjoining room, where Madame Chaise slept. She had left the communicating door open in order to be more with them, as she pleasantly expressed it. Accordingly he had hastened in, and flung the shutters open so as to admit both light and air. "And what a sight, Monsieur l'Abbé!" he continued. "Our poor aunt lying on her bed, nearly purple in the face already, her month wide open in a vain effort to breathe, and her hands fumbling with the sheet. It's her heard complaint, you know. Come at once, Monsieur l'Abbé, and help her, I implore you!"

Pierre, utterly bewildered, could find neither his breeches nor his eassock. "Of course, of course I'll come with you," said he. "But I have not what is necessary for administering the last sacraments."

M. Vigneron had assisted him to dress, and was now stooping down looking for his slippers. "Never mind," he said, "the mere sight of you will assist her in her last moments, if Heaven has this affliction in store for us. Here! put these on your feet, and follow me at once-oh! at once!"

He went off like a gust of wind and plunged into the adjoining room. All the doors remained wide open. The young priest, who followed him, noticed nothing in the first room, which was in an incredible state of disorder, beyond the half-naked figure of little Gustave, who sat on the sofa serving him as a bed, notionless, very pale, forgotten, and shivering amid this drama of inexorable death. Open bags littered the floor, the greasy remains of supper soiled the table, the parents' bed seemed devastated by the catastrophe, its coverlets torn off and lying on the ground. And almost immediately afterwards he caught sight of the mother, who had hastily enveloped herself in an old yellow dressing-gown, standing with a terrified look in the inner room.

"Well, my love, well, my love?" repeated M. Vigneron in stammering accents.

With a wave of her hand and without uttering a word Madame

The state of the s

had died before Gustave, and the youngster inherited her five Dead! The word rang out in that more tidy room where a heavy salence reigned, and the husband and wife looked at each togary salence reigned, and the husband and wife looked at each pulication. Pierre bent over her. Then in a low voice he said: "She is dead!" though with the great last gasp that had come from her. twisted. She was blue in the face, and her month gaped, as dess, with her head sunk in the pillow and her hands stiffened and Vigneron drew their attention to Madame Chaise, who lay motion-352 ECOLISM VAD TOAE nermost recesses of their hearts, in short, quite innocently and naturally. Certainly they had thought of it when they were at the Grotto, but was not the Blessed Virgin wisdom itself? Did tar less worthy nephery inherit that fortune, it was merely in the inmindred thousand trance, it would be to them to see another and Typicites they thought to those five without any ostentialon. το confession, ματακίπες στη μου συμπιστιστίτου του συμφεριστή του συμφερί του συμφερί του συμφερί του συμφερί Του του του συμφερί του σ anyone's death; they were worthy people incapable of any had already recognised the powerful hand of Our Lady of Lourdes. Had she again loaded them with favours, listening even to the ρυίς Λοιή Τορυία είτι σχυί τίβμα Αρία του τος τίσο ρίας δίασο Τίπος μας આંધોળાદ છે. પ્રેનાંદ દ્વાપાલનું દેશ ભારતનામાં આ ભારતનામાં આ માત્ર pled at the thought that they had not been able to express a wish tor this? She had shown herself so good to then that they treme that dream, whose sudden realisation dumfounded them? How many times had despair overcome them when they feared that the poor child might depart before her? Dead! Good lieavens! inniqued thousand tranes. How many times had they direit on Mobile for the sister whom she loved so much "Able," she said, "I saw her expire; she passed an a before my eyes. What a misfortune that you were not here sooner to tocking four priest; you present to be sooner to be seen to so and so and she disk without a priest; you present to would bing and its indicated the partial and the par slie not know far better than ourselves what slie ought to do for

A prey also to emotion, his eyes hill of tears. View on sought nave consoled her sa much."

I went at once, and really there is nothing for us to reproach been glad to see him. But what would you? Death was quicker. doubt, if Monsieur PAbbe had been here in time she would have insiety concerning her, her soul has gone strught to heaven, No communicated again yesterday morning, and you need have no to cousole his wife. "Your sister was a saint," said he, "she

it was her excessive piety which certainly lastened her end. then, turning towards the priest, he added "Monsiem Labbe, Yesterday, at the Grotto, she had a bad attack, which was a warning. And in spite of her fatigue she obstinately followed the procession afterwards. I thought then that she could not last long. Yet, out of delicacy, one did not like to say anything to her, for fear of frightening her."

Pierre gently knelt down and said the customary prayers, with that human emotion which was his nearest approach to faith in the presence of eternal life and eternal death, both so pitiful. Then, as he remained kneeling a little longer, he overheard snatches of the conversation around him.

Little Gustave, forgotten on his couch amid the disorder of the other room, must have lost patience, for he had begun to cry and call out, "Mammal mammal mammal"

At length Madame Vigneron went to quict him, and it occurred to her to carry him in her arms to kiss his poor aunt for the last time. But at first he struggled and refused, crying so much that M. Vigneron was obliged to interfere and try to make him ashamed of himself. "WhatI he who was never frightened of anything! who bore suffering with the courage of a grown-up man! And to think it was a question of kissing his poor aunt, who had always been so kind, whose last thought must most certainly have been for him!"

"Give him to me," said he to his wife; "he's going to be good." Gustave ended by clinging to his father's neck. He came shivering in his night-shirt, displaying his wretched little body devoured by scrofula. It seemed indeed as though the miraculous water of the piscinas, far from curing him, had freshened the sore on his back; whilst his scraggy leg hung down inertly like a dry stick.

"Kiss her," resumed M. Vigneron.

The child leant forward and kissed his aunt on the forehead. It was not death which upset him and caused him to struggle. Since he had been in the room he had been looking at the dead woman with an air of quiet curiosity. He did not love her, he had suffered on her account so long. He had the ideas and feelings of a man, and the weight of them was stifling him as they developed and became more acute at the same time as his complaint. He felt full well that he was too little, that children ought not to understand what only concerns their elders.

However, his father, seating himself out of the way, kept him on his knee, whilst his mother closed the window and lit the two candles on the mantelpiece. "Ahl my poor dear," murmured M. Vigneron, feeling that he must say something, "it's a cruel loss for all of us. Our trip is now completely spoilt; this is our last day, for we start this afternoon. And the Blessed Virgin, too, was showing herself so kind to us."

However, seeing his son's surprised look, a look of infinite sadness and reproach, he hastened to add: "Yes, of course, I know that she hasn't yet quite cured you. But we must not despair of her and the season desired temperature to probe a season when the management of management of a colorest at the color only favour that remains for her to grant us," that she will certainly end by curing you, since that is now tho kindness. She loves us so well, she shows us so many favours Madamo Vigneron, who was listening, drew near and said: "How hale and heartyl Mothing is ever perfectl.

"I sayl" suddenly observed Monsieur Vigneron, "I shan't be able to leave with you this afternoon, on account of the formalities which have to be gone through. I hope that my return ticket will be available to-morrow!

They were both getting over the frightful shock, feeling a senso to leave Lourdes as soon as possible, as though the principal object of their journey had been attained. A decotous, unavowed fact, they were already forgetting her, anxious above all things of relief in spite of their affection for Madanne Chaise, and, in purchase the estate of Les Billottes, that superb property down at my native place which I have always been dreaming of. And I promise you that I shan t find time languaging heavy on my hands of chief clerk, But afterwards—ohl afterwards I certainly hope to enjoy life a bit. Since this money has come to us, I shall the same I shall remain my three years at the Ministry, until I confined M. Vigueron. I, who now only long for reposel All "Much i Rei buck to Buis there will be so much for me to do."

mode min mal" to notice that he was there, he gave one of his emigmatical similes. father, now full of his dream of an opulent life, no longer seemed the thinness of a slowly dying child. When he perceived that his the pie rehole wreiched misshapen body shivering, and displacement, Little Gustave was still on his father's knee, his nightshirt theked in the midst of my horses, my dous, and my howers!"

at first seem to understand, "You, little one? You'll be with us A. Vigneron started, like one aroused from sleep, and did not me tufficis, ne uzked in which melancholy was tinged with malice.

of coursel"

he asked. But Custave gave him a long straight look, without ceasurg to smile with his artful though woeful lips. "Oh! do you think so?"

nice to be with us. "Of course I think sol You'll be with us, and it will be very Skinny shoulders with an air of philosophical disdam and answered: "Oh nol I shall be dead."

wered: "Oh nol I shall be dead."

And then the terrified father was suddenly able to detect in Uneasy, stammering, unable to find the proper world, A. Vigneton felt a chill come over him when his son shringed his very knowing in all things, acquainted with all the aboundations of life through having gone through them. What especially the child's deep glance the glance of a man who was very aged. alarmed him was the abrupt conviction that this child had always scen into the innermost recesses of his heart, even farther that the things he dared to acknowledge to himself. He could recal that when the little sufferer had been but a baby in his cradle his eyes would frequently be fixed upon his own-and even ther those eyes had been rendered so sharp by suffering, endowed too, with such an extraordinary power of divination, that they had seemed able to dive into the unconscious thoughts buried in the depths of his brain. And by a singular counter-effect all the things that he had never owned to himself he now found in hi child's cycs-he beheld them, read them there, against his will The story of his cupidity lay unfolded before him, his auger a having such a sorry son, his anguish at the idea that Madami Chaise's fortune depended upon such a fragile existence, hi eager desire that she might make haste and die whilst the young ster was still there, in order that he might finger the legacy. was simply a question of days, this duel as to which should g off first. And then, at the end, it still meant death—the youngste must in his turn disappear, whilst he, the father, alone pockets the eash, and lived joyfully to a good old age. And these frightful things shone forth so clearly from the keen, melancholy, smiling eyes of the poor condemned child, passed from son to fathe with such evident distinctness, that for a moment it seemed to them that they were shouting them aloud.

However, M. Vigneron struggled against it all, and averting his head, began energetically protesting; "How! You'll be dead. What an ideal It's absurd to have such ideas as that!"

Meantime Madame Vigneron was sobbing. "You wicked child, she gasped; "how can you make us so unhappy, when we alread have such a cruel loss to deplore?"

Gustave had to kiss them, and to promise them that he would live for their sakes. Yet he did not cease smiling, conscious a he was that a lic is necessary when one does not wish to be to miserable, and quite prepared moreover, to leave his parents happy behind him, since even the Blessed Virgin herself was powerless to grant him in this world the little happy lot to which each creature should be born.

His mother took him back to bed, and Pierre at length ros up, just as M. Vigneron had finished arranging the chambe of death in a suitable manner. "You'll excuse me, won't you Monsieur l'Abbé?" said he, accompanying the young priest to the door. "I'm not quite myself. Well, It's an unpleasant time to go through. I must get over it somehow, however.

When Pierre got into the passage he stopped for a moment listening to a sound of voices which was ascending the stairs. He had just been thinking of M. de Guersaint again, and imagined that he could recognise his voice. However, whilst he stood then waiting, an incident occurred which caused him intense dis The door of the room next to M. de Guersaint's softly rould not to recognise each other. Pierre, in such a fashion that it was impossible for them to prepassage. As she turned she found herself face to face with opened and a moman, chad in black, slipped quickly into the

there spending this last morning, in order in some measure, to hashify her journey to Loundes. When she perceived Piene she struck and she was going off, hoping that nobody would notice her, with the intention of showing herself at the Hospital, and The woman was Madame Yohnar, Six o'clock had not yet

Then, noticing that the priest had left his door wide open, she TAbbé, Monsiem l'Abbél" begin to tremble, and, at first, could only stammer: "Oh, Monsieur begged that he would close it. she who, in her desire to confide her sorrow and her sin to bin, seemed to give way to the dever consuming her, to a need of speaking out, explaining things, and justifying herself. With her face suffused by a rish of blood she entered the young man's strange adventure. And, as he still left the door open, it was strange adventure. And, as he still left the door open, it was strange adventure. And, as he still left the door open, it was strange adventure.

"Ohl I pray you, Monsieur Pabbé," said she, "do not judge one too harshig."

He made a gesture as though to reply that he did not allow tier lips were quivering, and tears were welling and ber ever there-in that room. But it you only knew-all, it you only knew!" Paris behind the church of La Trinite, and the other day you re-cognised inc on the halcony here! You were aware that I was Lou saw ine once in You are acquainted with my misfortunes. "But yes, but yes, she responded: "I know very nell that timiself the right to pass judgment upon her.

veil of indifference-were flaring the torches, and he understood that she should be loved, adored, to madness. inflicent eyes, whose brasies she usually sought so, cover with a powerful, intesistible beauty. Her eyes especially-her large, magdark and stender, with drawn features, a large month and long a more assumed, as the new examined her, a troubling chann, a combing chann, gloom, no longer seeking to bedint the hotte of her yes, as was her wont, She, who at first sight did not seem prefet, but uso the in mid to be a sign of the control of the simple and to the sign of the passion of the passion of the passion of the passion of the control of the contr ាក្ខាត្រ ក្នុក នូកជាខ្លៅខណភា This woman, invariably clad in black, As he looked at her he was surprised by the extraordinary beauty mother-in-law and my hashand. On the few occasions n have earlied on us you cannot but have understood some A crolletion of the latter of the soll of the organistic of the property of the property of the control of the "H you only know, Monsiem Pables" the continue d.

driven to appear happy in my little alera corner. But to high chomonal things which go on in my hone, though I have alarmed him was the abrupt conviction that this child had always seen into the innermost recesses of his heart, even farther than the things he dared to acknowledge to himself. He could recall that when the little sufferer had been but a baby in his eradle his eyes would frequently be fixed upon his own-and even then those eyes had been rendered so sharp by suffering, endowed, too, with such an extraordinary power of divination, that they had seemed able to dive into the unconscious thoughts buried in the depths of his brain. And by a singular counter-effect all the things that he had never owned to himself he now found in his child's eyes-he beheld them, read them there, against his will. The story of his eupidity lay unfolded before him, his anger at having such a sorry son, his anguish at the idea that Madame Chaise's fortune depended upon such a fragile existence, his eager desire that she might make haste and die whilst the youngster was still there, in order that he might finger the legacy. It was simply a question of days, this duel as to which should go off first. And then, at the end, it still meant death-the youngster must in his turn disappear, whilst he, the father, alone pocketed the eash, and lived joyfully to a good old age. And these frightful things shone forth so clearly from the keen, melancholy, smiling eyes of the poor condemned child, passed from son to father with such evident distinctness, that for a moment it seemed to them that they were shouting them aloud.

However, M. Vigneron struggled against it all, and averting his head, began energetically protesting; "How! You'll be dead?

What an idea! It's absurd to have such ideas as that!"

Meantime Madame Vigneron was sobbing. "You wicked child," she gasped; "how can you make us so unhappy, when we already have such a cruel loss to deplore?"

Gustave had to kiss them, and to promise them that he would live for their sakes. Yet he did not eease smiling, conscious as he was that a lie is necessary when one does not wish to be too miserable, and quite prepared moreover, to leave his parents happy behind him, since even the Blessed Virgin herself was powerless to grant him in this world the little happy lot to which each creature should be born.

His mother took him back to bed, and Pierre at length rose up, just as M. Vigneron had finished arranging the chamber of death in a suitable manner. "You'll excuse me, won't you, Monsieur l'Abbé?" said he, accompanying the young priest to the door. "I'm not quite myself. Well, It's an unpleasant time to go through. I must get over it somehow, however."

When Pierre got into the passage he stopped for a moment, listening to a sound of voices which was ascending the stairs. He had just been thinking of M. de Guersaint again, and imagined that he could recognise his voice. However, whilst he stood there waiting, an incident occurred which caused him intense dis-comfort. The door of the room next to M. de Guersaint's softly opened and a wamm, clad in black, slipped quickly into the passage. As she turned she found herself also to said a fact it was impossible for them in pretend not to recognise each other,

Tablac, Monsieur Pabbell began, to tremble, and, at first, could only stammer: "Oh, Monsieur The woman was Malame Volmar. Six o'clock had not yet struck and she was going off, hoping that nobody would notice her, with the intention of showing herself at the Huspital, and there spending this last morning, in order in some measure, to there spending this last morning, in order in some measure, to instify her journey to Lourdes. When she perceived Pierre she beam to trouble and at the perceived Pierre she she who, in her desire to confide her sorrow and her sin to hin, stringe adventire, And, as he still left the door open, it was seemed to give way to the fever consuming her, to a need of speaking out, explaining things, and justifying herself. With her face suffused by a rush of blood she entered the young man's moun, whither he had to follow her, greatly disturbed by this seem when the had to follow her, greatly disturbed by this seem when the fact the door man it is the content of the seem of the s Then, noticing that the priest had left his door wide open, she

"Oht I pray you, Monsieur l'Abbé," said she, "do not judge begged that he would close it.

Musand ool out

He made a gesture as though to reply that he did not allow tier lips were quivering, and tears were welling this her eyes. Paris behind the church of La Trinité, and the other day you re-cognised me on the balcony here! You were aware that I was there—in that room, But if you only knew—ah, if you only lanew!" Lou are acquainted with my mistorime. You saw me once in "But yes, but yes," she responded; "I know very well that himself the right to pass judgment upon her that she should be loved, adored, to madness, and he understood inflicent exess whose densiers she usually sought to cover with a powerful, irresistible beauty. Her eyes especially-her large, magher wont. She, who at first sight did not seem pretty, but too dark and slender, with drawn tentures, a large mouth and long nose, assumed, as he now examined her, a troubling charm, a extremely simple, with never a jewel, now appeared to him in all the brilliancy of her passion; no longer drawing back into the gloom, no longer drawing back into the gloom, no longer seeking to bedin the linstre of her yes, as was trinsնknyting her face. This woman, invariably elad in black, As he looked at her he was surprised by the extraordinary beauty striven to appear lappy in my little silent corner. But to live like abounted things which go on in my home, though I have always mother-in-law and my linsband. On the few occasions when you were only to tell you all that I have suffered. Doubtless you have suspected something of it, since you are acquainted with my "If you only knew, Mousicur Pable," she continued.

that for ten years, to have no existence-never to love, never to be loved-no, no, it was beyond my power!"

And then she related the whole painful story: her marriage with the diamond merchant, a disastrous, though it seemed an advantageous one; her mother-in-law, with the stern soul of a jailer or an executioner, and her husband, a monster of physical ugliness and mental villainy. They imprisoned her, they did not even allow her to look out of a window. They had beaten her, they had pitilessly assailed her in her tastes, her inclinations, in all her feminine weaknesses. She knew that her husband wandered in his affections, and yet if she smiled to a relative, if she had a flower in her corsage on some rare day of gaiety, he would tear it from her, enter into the most jealous rage, and seize and bruise her wrists whilst shouting the most fearful threats. years and years she had lived in that hell, hoping, hoping still, having within her such a power of life, such an ardent need of affection, that she continued waiting for happiness, ever thinking, at the faintest breath, that it was about to enter.

"I swear to you, Monsieur l'Abbé," said she, "that I could not do otherwise than I have done. I was too unhappy: my whole being longed for some one who would care for me. And when my friend the first time told me that he loved me it was all over—I was his for ever. Ahl to be loved, to be spoken to gently, to have some one near you who is always solicitous and amiable; to know that in absence he thinks of you, that there is a heat somewhere in which you live...Ahl if it be a crime, Monsieur l'Abbé, I cannot, cannot feel remorse for it. I will not even say that I was urged to it, I simply say that it came to me as naturally as my breath, because it was as necessary to my life!"

She had carried her hand to her lips as though to throw a kiss to the world, and Pierre felt deeply disturbed in presence of this lovely woman, who personified all the ardour of human passion, and at the same time a feeling of deep pity began to a stree within him.

arise within him.
"Poor woman!" he murmured.

"It is not to the priest that I am confessing," she resumed; "it is to the man that I am speaking, to a man by whom I should greatly like to be understood. No, I am not a believer: religion has not sufficed me. It is said that some women find contentment in it, a firm protection even against all transgressions. But I have ever felt cold in church, weary unto death. Oh! I know very well that it is wrong to feign piety, to mingle religion with my heart affairs. But what would you? I am forced to it. If you saw me in Paris behind the Trinité it was because that church is the only place to which I am allowed to go alone; and if you find me here at Lourdes it is because in the whole long year, I have but these three days of happiness and freedom."

Again she began to tremble. Hot tears were coursing down her cheeks. A vision of it all arose in Pierre's mind, and, distracted by the thought of the ardent earthly love which possessed year must go by without a day, an hour of happiness! Aid I am a good woman? life of martyrdom without complaint. Another year, another this unhappy creature, he again murmured; "Poor woman!" "And, Monsieur l'Abbe," she continued, "think of the hell to which I am about to return! For weeks and months I live my and his words were words of pardon, "Madame," he said, "I a sovereign fignic. And his compassion overflowed from his heart, He had been deeply moved by her sincere display of mingled grief and passion. He felt in her this breath of universal desirepith hon and respect you infinitely."

she grasped them tightly with her burning fingers. And then she went off, vanishing down the passage as light, as ethereal as a Then she spoke no further, but looked at him with her large tear-blurred eyes. And suddenly eatching hold of both his hands, pride of purity, all his strength which he had placed in his professional rectitude, thereupon returned to him, and he again vowed that he would never be a man, since he had voluntarily cut himself off from among men. before him: his chastity was his last prop, the very dignity of his spoilt life; and he realised that, if after yielding to his reason ho also yielded to his flesh, he would be utterly lost. All his love, to belong to one another, to create and continue life-was religious policies? For a monicity he was conscious of the abyss religious policies? For a monicity he was conscious of the abyss than faith, and perliaps it was only love that was diving. now his terror was returning to him. Love seemed stronger amidst all the mystical exaltation of immaculate Lourdes. that she personified the revenge of the world and the flesh she had left there. Already on the Siniday when he had seen jor on the ballery when he had seen wide that the tresh air might earry off the breath of passion which more geutely affer she had departed. He opened the window However, Pierre suffered from her presence in that room even 'Mopuls his room, and some one knocked. With a feeling of relief he went to open the door, but on doing so exclaimed in great surgrise: "What, it's you! How is it that you're already up, running a sound of footstops in the passage. obisino boqqois equis esoill anxious thought of M. de Cuersaint recurred to him on hearing Seven o'clock was striking, and Pierre did not go back to bed, but began to wash himself, thoroughly enjoying the cool water, which ended by calming his fever. As he finished dressing the which ended by calming his fever.

Marie stood on the threshold smiling whilst behind her was Sister Hyacinthe, who had come with her, and who also was smiling, with her lovely, candid eyes. "joldood oos of thour

"Ahl my friend," said the girl, "I could not remain in bed. I sprang out directly I saw the sunshine. I had such a longing to walk, to run and jump about like a child, and I begged and implored so much that Sister was good enough to come with me. I think I should have got out through the window if the door had been closed against me."

Pierre ushered them in, and an indescribable emotion oppressed him as he heard her jest so gaily and saw her move about so freely with such grace and liveliness. She, good heavens! she whom he had seen for years with lifeless legs and colourless facel Since he had left her the day before at the Basilica she had blossomed into full youth and beauty. One night had sufficed for him to find again, developed it is true, the sweet creature whom he had loved so tenderly, the superb, radiant child whom he had embraced so wildly in the bygone days behind the flowering hedge, beneath the sun-flecked trees.

"How tall and lovely you are, Mariel" said he in spite of himself.

Then Sister Hyacinthe interposed: "Hasn't the Blessed Virgin done things well, Monsieur l'Abbé? When she takes us in hand, you see, she turns us out as fresh as roses and smelling quite as sweet.

'Ahl" resumed Marie, "I'm so happy; I feel quite strong and well and spotless, as though I had just been born!"

All this was very delicious to Pierre. It seemed to him that the atmosphere was now truly purified of Madame Volmar's presence. Marie filled the room with her candour, with the perfume and brightness of her innocent youth. And yet the joy he felt at the sight of pure beauty and life reflowering was not exempt from sadness. For, after all, the revolt which he had felt in the crypt, the wound of his wreeked life, must for ever leave him a bleeding heart. As he gazed upon all that resuscitated grace, as the woman he loved thus reappeared before him in the flower of her youth, he could not but remember that she would never be his, that he belonged no longer to the world, but to the grave. However, he no longer lamented; he experienced a boundless inclancholy-a sensation of utter nothingness as he told himself that he was dead, that this dawn of beauty was rising on the tomb in which his manhood slept. It was renunciation, necepted, resolved upon amidst all the desolate grandeur attaching to those lives which are led contrary to nature's law.

Then, like the other woman, the impassioned one, Marie took hold of Pierre's hands. But hers were so soft, so fresh, so soothing! She looked at him with some little confusion and a great longing which she dared not express. After a while, however, she summoned up her courage and said: "Will you kiss me, Pierre? It would please me so much."

He shuddered, his heart crushed by this last torture. Ahl the kisses of other days-those kisses which had ever lingered on his lips sinack on hoth his cheeks, and, offering her own, insisted on his dinging her urns around his neck. She kissed him with a loud Never since had he kissed her, and to-day she was like a sister doing likewise to her. So twice, in his turn, he embraced her.

secking to hille its tears. into sobs, weeping with his face buried in his hands, like a child whilst at the same time filled with delight and bitterness, he burst The too, Marie, said he, "an pleased, very pleased, I assure, "I too, Marie," said he, "an pleased, very pleased, I assure,

"goil Tuei we had merely come on his account. At the Guersaint is about, "Come, come, we must not give way," said Sister Hynciuthe

After all, it's he who'll be most pleased!" "Abl my dear father! ygue ujecj a cD of gech agergon'

All at muce Sister Hyacinthe, who had gone to lean over the her legs again, resuscitated, in the fresh blossoming of her youth. was extremely eager for him to see her walking, to find her on laughed, saying that her father never could be punctual. Still she triend's absence, surmising all sorts of obstacles and unforescence complications. Marie, however, did not seem alraid, but again showed itself while he spoke, although he songht to explain his returned from his excursion to Gazarnie. His increasing anxiety Thereupon Pierre had to relate that M. de Guersaint had not

ુંમાં, ત્યાંએ સુપ્રમું માંણ દ્રાણે અક્ષર કામ્યુપામાં અવસ્થાનું મુખ્ balcony, returned to the room, saying, "three he comed the's here we'll show ourselves all of a sudden.

adjoining room. With these words, she hastily dragged Sister Hyacuthe ndo the a trightful storm detained us all night long at Same-Sancou. I wasn't able to sleep a wink. Then, breaking oil, be inquired. And you, are you all right? then, yesterday evening-though we managed to start off againof the wheels of our landay came off just as we reached Caramus. have no idea of the adventures we have had to beam with, one tour o cjock lesterquel mien kon expected in pack (p. But con List And my friend, you can't have known what to think some brieses inimg the pelated excitesionsel exclamated in him sums pag been duickly obened by Rieges and spaging the Soung Almost inmediately aftervards M. de Cricramic entered black don't direction from the transmission community and a don't community and the door community and make the door community and the first principles.

Twist I all to sleep either, and the price of the rack I' nas with three delightful Churchmen. Abbé Des Hermores is cerremacher from novering left frame I diffigliab some if comes But M. de Guersaint had already started off agon "Jolod odj ni osion n tainly the most charming man I know. Oh! we did laugh-we did laugh!"

Then he again stopped, to inquire, "And how's my daughter?"
Thereupon a clear laugh behind him caused him to turn round, and he remained with his mouth wide open. Marie was there, and was walking, with a look of rapturous delight upon her face, which was beaming with health. He had never for a moment doubted the miracle, and was not in the least surprised that it had taken place, for he had returned with the conviction that he would surely find her cured. But what so utterly astounded him was the prodigious spectacle which he had not forescen: his daughter looking so beautiful, so divine, in her little black gownl—his daughter, who had not even brought a hat with her, and merely had a piece of lace tied over her lovely fair hair!—his daughter, full of life, blooming, triumphant, similar to all the daughters of all the fathers whom he had envied for so many years!

"O my child! O my child!" he exclaimed.

And, as she had flown into his arms, he pressed her to his heart, and then they fell upon their knees together. Everything disappeared from before them in a radiant effusion of faith and love. This heedless, hare-brained man, who fell asleep instead of accompanying his daughter to the Grotto, who went off to Gavarnie on the day the Blessed Virgin was to cure her, overflowed with such paternal affection, with such Christian faith so exalted by thankfulness, that for a moment he appeared sublime.

"O Jesus! O Mary! let me thank you for having restored my child to me! O my child, we shall never have breath enough, soul enough, to render thanks to Mary and Jesus for the great happiness they have vouchsafed us. O my child, whom they have made so beautiful again, take my heart to offer it to them with your own. I am yours, I am theirs eternally, O my beloved child, my adored child!"

Kneeling before the open window they both, with uplifted eyes, gazed ardently on Heaven. The daughter had rested her head upon her father's shoulder; whilst he had passed an arm round her waist. They had become one. Tears slowly trickled down their enraptured faces, which were smiling with superhuman felicity, whilst they stammered together disconnected expressions of gratitude.

"O Jesus, we give Thee thanks! O Holy Mother of Jesus, we give thee thanks! We love you, we adore you both. You have rejuvenated the best blood in our veins; it is yours, it eirculates only for you. O All-powerful Mother, O Divine and Well-beloved Son, behold a daughter and a father who bless you, who prostrate themselves with joy at your feet."

So affecting was this mingling of two beings, happy at last after so many dark days, this happiness, which could but stammer as though still tinged with suffering, that Pierre was again moved lumanity, saved by love, personified by that poor childish man the eternal illusion! Was not the whole of humanity, pitiable his heart. Ahl poor pitiable humanity! how pleasant it was to see it somewhat consoled and enraptured and what did it matter, after all, if its great joys of a few seconds duration sprang from to tears. But this time they were soothing tears which relieved spoke the first, when the father and the daughter, overcome with And it was she who room full of so much tearful traternity. Almighty and the Blessed Virgin. Silence had now fallen in this experienced, she who had known no other parents than the heart very full, full of human emotion which she had never before Standing a little aside, Sister Hyacinthe was also weeping, her resuscitated?

emotion, at length rose up. "We must be quick and get back to the Hospital."

world. longing to enoy life, to walk and ramble through the whole vast But thoy all protested. M. de Cuersaint wished to keep his daughter with him, and Marie's eyes expressed an cager desire, a

"Ohl no, nol" said the father, "I won't give her back to you.
We'll each have a cup of milk, for I'm dying of thirst; then we'll go out and walk about. Yes, yes, both of us. She shall take my arm like a little woman."

are to be ready in time to leave; there are all the patients and me. But for my own part I must be off. You've no idea what Sister Hyacinthe laughed again, "Very welll" said she, "The leave her with you, and tell the ladies that you've stolen her from things to be seen to; and all is in the greatest confusion!"

"So to-day's really Tuesday, and we leave this afternoon?"
asked Monsieur de Cuersaint, already absent-minded again.

"Of course we do, and don't forged The white train starts at 3.40. And if you're sensible you'll bring your daughter early, so that she may have a little rest."

will be very good. Besides, I want to go back to the Grotto, to thank the Blessed Virgin once more. Marie walked with the Sister to the door, saying: "Be easy, I mountains, whilst the hundred bells of Lourdes proclaimed with flying peals the glory of that radiant day. They chattered and laughed, and the young woman told her father the story of the come upon her since the night before. They drew the table to already broken her fast, she ate again, so great an appetite had full of sunshine, it was delicious. Pierre called the servant and told her to bring them some milk, some chocolate and cakes, in fact the nicest things he could think of. And although Marie had altered though Marie had altered the fact she at a great an appetite had When they found themselves all three alone in the little room miracle, with all the oft-repeated details. She related, too, how she had left her box at the Basilica, and how she had slent twelve hours without stirring. Then M. de Guersaint on his side wished to relate his excursion, but got mixed and kept coming back to the miracle. Finally, it appeared that the Cirque de Gavarnie was something colossal. Only, when you looked at it from the distance it seemed small, for you lost all sense of proportion. The gigantie snow-covered tiers of cliffs, the topmost ridge standng ont against the sky with the outlines of some evelonean fortess with razed keep and jagged ramparts, the great eascade, whose ceaseless jet seemed so slow when in reality it must have rushed down with a noise like thunder, the whole immensity, the lorests on right and left, the torrents and the landslips, looked as though they might have been held in the palm of one's hand, when one gazed upon them from the village market-place. And what had impressed him most, what he repeatedly alluded to, were the strange figures described by the snow, which had remained up there amongst the rocks. Amongst others was a luge crueifix, a white cross, several thousand yards in length, which you might have thought had been thrown across the amphitheatre from one end to the other.

However, all at once M. de Guersaint broke off to inquire: "By the way, what's happening at our neighbour's? As I came upstairs a little while ago I met Monsieur Vigneron running about like a madman; and through the open doorway of their room, I fancied I saw Madame Vigneron looking very red. Has their son

Gustave had another attack?"

Pierre had quite forgotten Madame Chaise lying dead on the other side of the partition. He seemed to feel a cold breath pass over him. "No, no," he answered, "the child is all right." And over him. "No, no," he answered, "the child is all right." And he said no more, preferring to remain silent. Why spoil this happy hour of new life and reconquered youth by mingling with it the image of death? However, from that moment he himself could not cease thinking of the proximity of nothingness. And he thought, too, of that other room where Madame Volmar's friend was now alone, stifling his sobs with his lips pressed upon a pair of gloves which he had stolen from her. All the sounds of the hotel were now becoming audible again—the coughs, the sights the indistinct voices, the continual slamming of doors, the creaking of the floors beneath the great accumulation of travellers, and all of the floors beneath the great accumulation of travellers, and all the stir in the passages, along which flying skirts were sweeping and families galloping distractedly amidst the hurry-scurry of

"On my word! you'll do yourself an injury," all at once cried Monsieur de Guersaint, on sceing his daughter take up another

Marie was quite merry too. But at a sudden thought tears came into her eyes, and she exclaimed: "Ah! how glad I am! but also how sorry when I think that everybody is not as pleased as myself."

PLEASANT HOURS 11

blood, and her heart. It was an irresistible impulsion, a flight of her entire being, her presence of every ane, now that the Blessed Virgin had cured herl squares, to go everywhere as fur as she might wish. And to show what a pleasure to be able to run about the streets, across the to inhale all the air of the vast expanse and the immense sky. All not sit still, but continued going to the window, as it she wished IT was eight o'clock, and Marie was so impatient that she could and might vails wherever they chose, before she returned to that her first visit with her father anglit to be to the Crotto However, just as she was setting out she made up her mind

they would be free; they would have two long hours before them, where both of them had to thank Our Lady of Lourdes.

Pierre, took his hat, and all three went downstairs, talking yery ме иникс и тиолов. "Well, is every one ready?" repeated M. de Guersaint, "Shall buigh and pack up her few things at the Hospital.

and og of mont tot guillay nood althobive lond and laughing on the staircase, like hoisterous school-boys going for their holidays. They had almost reached the street, which at the doorway Madame Maleste rushed forward, She had

.bine ode "We have heard of the extraordingry favour that "Ahl mademoisellel ahl gendemen, allow me to congratulate

Her dry, harsh three was melting guild middling, that the obthe Blessed Virgin is pleased to solven of our customered, when

Then she impulsively called her husband, who was passing. "Look, my dearl it's mademoiseller it's mademoiseller." Indicate's clean-sharen face, pulled out with yellow fat, assumserve the mirrenlously healed gul with the fondest of cyce ed a happy and grateful expression. "Really, mademorelle, I canτις ζικλ οι παίιλ Εςορίς. not tell you how honoured we feel," said he. "We shall mever forget that your place of the said sour place of the said your place. If has already eveiled the previous day. People ended by collecting there, a crossed house the mirricle at which all Louides had been marveling smen street if they had given her time, to show that she had in best While he spoke, Madamo Majeste stopped the other travelle is going out and with a sign summoned the families already scaled on the dining-tooms indeed, she would have called in the whole in the whole gathered little by little, while she whispered in the ear of each: "Look! that's her; the young party, you know, the young party who—"

But all at once she exclaimed: "I'll go and fetch Apolline from the shop; I must show mademoiselle to Apolline.

Thereupon, however, Majesté, in a very dignified way, restrained her. "No," he said, "leave Apolline; she has three ladies to serve already. Mademoiselle and these gentlemen will certainly not leave Lourdes without making a few purchases. The little souvenirs that one carries away with one are so pleasant to look at later on! And our customers make a point of never buying clsewhere than here, in the shop which we have annexed to the. hotel."

"I have already offered my services," added Madame Majesté, "and I renew them. Apolline will be so happy to show mademoisclle all our prettiest articles at prices, too, which are incredibly low! Oh! there are some delightful things, delightful!"

Marie was becoming impatient at being detained in this manner, and Pierre was suffering from the increasing curiosity which they were arousing. As for M. de Guersaint, he enjoyed this popularity and triumph of his daughter immensely, and promised to return. "Certainly," said he, "we will purchase a few little knick-knacks. Some souvenirs for ourselves, and some presents that we shall have to make, but later on, when we come back."

At last they escaped and descended the Avenue de la Grotte. The weather was again superb after the storms of the two preceding nights. Cooled by the rain, the morning air was delicious amidst the gaiety which the bright sun shed around. A busy crowd, well pleased with life, was already hurrying along the pavements. And what pleasure it all was for Marie, to whom everything seemed new, charming, inappreciable! In the morning she had had to allow Raymonde to lend her a pair of boot, for she had taken good care not to put any in her portmanteau, super-stitiously fearing that they might bring her bad luck. However, Raymonde's boots fitted her admirably, and she listened with childish delight to the little heels tapping merrily on the flagstones. And she did not remember having ever seen houses so white, trees so green, and passers-by so happy. All her senses secmed holiday-making, endowed with a marvellously delicate sensibility; she heard music, smelt distant perfumes, savoured the air greedily, as though it were some delicious fruit. But what she considered, above all, so nice, so charming, was to walk along in this wise on her father's arm. She had never done so before, although she had felt the desire for years, as for one of those impossible pleasures with which people occupy their minds when invalided. And now her dream was realised, and her heart beat with joy. She pressed against her father, and strove to walk very upright and look very handsome, so as to do him honour. And he was quite proud, as happy as she was, showing, exhibiting her, overcome with joy at the thought that she belonged to him, that she was his plood, his flesh, his daughter, henceforth beaming with youth and health,

astler the pilgrims, M. de Guersaint exclaimed: "We are surely guiuum sioffes denga bing and Buissore of the figure of the skinding skinding states of the state of the skinding skindi not going to the Grotto empty-handed!"

been aecomplished, Lady of Lourdes bless you, my beautiful young lady! May she cure you of your complaints, you and yours!" This enlivened them again, and they set out once more, all three laughing, anused like children at the idea that the good woman's wish had already any again, the contract of the con candles at two francs each, a very reasonable price, as she repeatedly said. And on being paid, the old ereature, who had in angulat face, covetous eyes, and a nose like the beak of a bird of prey, returned profuse and mellilluous thanks. "May our little of prey, returned profuse and mellilluous thanks. "May our for it out of his own little purse, somewhat abashed meantime by the girl's unblushing effrontery. Then Pierre in his turn settled for the three eandles which Marie had taken from an old woman, and manner. It only eost twenty sous, and he insisted on paying developed girl of twenty, who was extremely bold both in look as round and hard as a cabbage-off a handsome, fair-haired, well-Such was the onshaught that it became necessary to struggle in order to extricate oneself. M, de Guersaint ended by pureliasing the largest nosegay he could see-a bouquet of white marguerites, with eaget fingers thrust their goods into their faces. "My beautiful young lady! My good gentleman! Buy of me, of me, of mel" brightened by her merry humour, thereupon stopped, and they were at once surrounded by a crowd of female hawkers, who Pierre, who was walking on the other side of Marie, himself kiss with which her heart melted. the fad already polished. And the strength of her gratified, a love in which she put forth all the strength of her gratified, a of the Blessed Virgin, at the very spot, indeed, which millions of lips had already polished, And the stone received a kiss of railing, she imprinted a long kiss upon the rock, below the statue in Paradise itself, steeped trapturously in a pleasant warmth and odour, which slightly oppressed her. When she had raised herself tapers at the bottom of the large basket, and had raised herself on tiptoe to fix the bouquet on one of the spears of the iron on tiptoe to fix the bouquet on one of the spears of the status hitherto only seen from her box of misery; she breathed there, as the altar of engraved silver, the harmonium-organ, the votive offerings, the eandle-holders streaming with wax, blazing in proud daylight. She was now inside that Grotto which she had the line their turn eams, after waiting some three or four minutes. And with what enraptured glances did she then examine everything were not many people as yet, and having gone to the end of the bouquet and eandles herself before even kneeling down. There At the Grotto Marie wished to enter at once, in order to offer

When she was once more outside, Marie prostrated and lumn-

bled herself in an almost endless act of thanksgiving. Her father bled herself in an almost endless act of tranksgiving. Her lattice also had knelt down near her, and mingled the fervour of his gratitude with hers. But he could not remain doing the same thing for long. Little by little he became uneasy, and ended by bending down to his daughter's ear to tell her that he had a call to make which he had previously forgotten. Assuredly the best course would be for her to remain where she was, praying, and waiting for him. While she completed her devotions he would hurry along and get his troublesome errand over; and then they might walk about at case wheresoever they liked. She did not understand him, did not even hear him, but simply nodded her head, promising that she would not move, and then such tender faith again took possession of her that her eyes, fixed on the white statue of the Virgin, filled with tears.

When M. de Guersaint had joined Pierre, who had remained a little distance off, he gave him the following explanation. "My dear fellow," he said, "it's a matter of eonseience; I formally promised the coachman who drove us to Gavarnie that I would see his master and tell him the real cause of our delay. You know whom I mean—the hair-dresser on the Place du Marcadal. And, besides, I want to get shaved."

Pierre, who felt uneasy at this proposal, had to give way in face of the promise that they would be back within a quarter of an hour. Only, as the distance seemed long, he on his side insisted on taking a trap which was standing at the bottom of the Plateau de la Merlasse. It was a sort of greenish cabriolet, and its driver, a fat fellow of about thirty, with the usual Basque cap on his head, was smoking a cigarette whilst waiting to he hired. Perched sideways on the seat with his knees wide apart, he drove them on with the tranquil indifference of a well-fed ways on the seat with the tranquil indifference of a well-fed man who considers himself the master of the street.
"We will keep you," said Pierre as he alighted, when they had reached the Place du Marcadal.

"Very well, very well, Monsieur l'Abbél I'll wait for you!"

"Very well, very well, Monsieur l'Abbél I'll wait for you!"
And then, leaving his lean horse in the hot sun, the driver went to chat and laugh with a strong, dishevelled servant-girl, who was washing a dog in the basin of the neighbouring fountain.
Cazaban, as it happened, was just then on the threshold of his shop, the lofty windows and pale green painting of which enlivened the dull Place, which was so deserted on week-days.
When he was not pressed with work he delighted to triumph in this manner, standing between his two windows, which potof pomatum and bottles of perfumery decorated with bright shades of colour. shades of colour.

He at once recognised the gentlemen. "Very flattered, very much honoured. Pray walk in, I beg of you," he said.

Then, at the first words which M. de Guersaint said to him to excuse the man who had driven him to Gavarnie, he showed himself well-disposed. Of course it was not the man's fault:

of speech and gesture. He returned to his former indictment. and enumerated all the many grievances that the old town had against the Fathers. The hotel-keepers complained; the dealers in religious fancy articles did not take half the amount they ought to have realised; and, finally, the new town monopolised both the pilgrims and the cash; there was now no possibility for any one but the keepers of the lodging-houses, hotels, and shops open in the neighbourhood of the Grotto to make any money whatever. It was a merciless struggle, a deadly hostility increasing from day to day, the old city losing a little of its life each season, and assuredly destined to disappear, to be choked, assassinated, by the young town. Ahl their dirty Grottol He would rather have his feet cut off than tread there. Wasn't it heartrending, that knick-knack shop which they had stuck beside it? A shameful thing, at which a bishop had shown himself so indignant that it was said he had written to the Popel He, Cazaban, who flattered himself with being a freethinker and a Republican of the old days, who already under the Empire had voted for the Opposition candidates, assuredly had the right to declare that he did not believe in their dirty Grotto, and that he did not care a fig for itl

"Look here, monsieur," he continued; "I am going to tell you a fact. My brother belongs to the municipal council, and it's through him that I know it. I must tell you first of all that we now have a Republican municipal council, which is much worried by the demoralisation of the town. You can no longer go out at night without meeting girls in the streets—you know, those candle-hawkers! They gad about with the drivers who come here when the season commences, and swell the suspicious floating population which comes no one knows whence. And I must also explain the position of the Fathers towards the town. When they purchased the land at the Grotto they signed an agreement by which they undertook not to engage in any business there. Well, they have opened a shop in spite of their signature. Is not that an unfair rivalry, unworthy of honest people? So the new council decided on sending them a deputation to insist on the agreement being respected, and enjoining them to close their shop at once. What do you think they answered, monsieur? Ohl what they have replied twenty times before, what they will always answer, when they are reminded of their engagements: 'Very well, we consent to keep them, but we are masters a our own place, and we'll close the Grottol'

He raised himself up, his razor in the air, and, repeating hi words, his eyes dilated by the enormity of the thing, he said "We'll close the Grotto."

Pierre, who was continuing his slow walk, suddenly stoppe and said in his face, "Welll the municipal council had only to answer, 'Close it.'"

At this Cazaban almost choked; the blood rushed to his face, up and dragged her invalid carriage as far as the choir of the Basiliea."

.M. de Guersaint, who was about to sit down after wiping himself, gave a complacent laugh: "That young lady is my daughter," he said.

Thereupon, under this sudden and fortunate flash of enlightenment, Cazahan heeame all smiles. He felt reassured, and combed M. de Guersaint's hair with a masterly touch, amid a returning exuberance of speech and gesture. "Ahl monsionr, I congratulate you, I am flattered at having you in my hands. Since the young lady your daughter is cured, your father's heart is at case. Am I not right?"

And he also found a few pleasant words for Pierre. Then, when he had decided to let them go, he looked at the priest with an air of conviction, and remarked, like a sensible man desirous of coming to a conclusion on the subject of miracles: "There are some, Monsieur l'Abbé, which are good fortunes for everybody. From time to time we require one of that description.

Outside, M. de Guersaint had to go and fetch the coachmat who was still laughing with the servant-girl, while her dor dripping with water, was shaking itself in the sun. In fix minutes the trap brought them back to the bottom of the Plateau de la Merlasse. The trip had taken a good half-hom Pierre wanted to keep the conveyance, with the idea of showing Marie the town without giving her too much fatigue. So while the father ran to the Grotto to fetch his daughter, he waited there beneath the trees.

The coachman at once engaged in conversation with the priest He had lit another eigarette and showed himself very familiar He came from a village in the environs of Tonlouse, and did no complain, for he carned good round sums each day at Lourdes You fed well there, said he, you annused yourself, it was what you might call a good neighbourhood. He said these things with the abandon of a man who was not troubled with religious seruples, but yet did not farget the respect which he owed to ar ecelesiastic.

At last, from the top of his box, where he remained half lying down, dangling one of his legs, he allowed this remark to fall slowly from his lips: "Ahl yes, Monsienr l'Abhé, Lourdes has caught on well, but the question is whether it will all last long!"

Pierre, who was very much struck by the remark, was ponderin' on its involuntary profundity, when M. de Guersaint reappeared bringing Marie with him. He had found her kneeling on the same spot, in the same act of faith and thankfulness, at the feet of the Blessed Virgin; and it seemed as if she had brought all the brilliant light of the Grotto away in her eyes, so vividly did they sparkle with divine joy at her cure. She would not consent t keep the trap. No, not she preferred to go on foot; she did no.

ards she wished to return by way of the streets, among the owd, that she might find the agitation, noise, and life, the need ass, the leaves, the shady solitary walks where you heard the relasting thepling of the Gave, were so sweet and fresh! But aftereets, the squares, anywhere they pleased! And, when Pierre d paid the driver, it was she who turned into a path in the splinnade garden, delighted at being able to sannter in this wise vide the turt and the flower-beds, under the great trees. The re about seeing the town, so long as she might for another hour ntinue, walking on her father's arm through the gardens, the

which possessed her whole being.

giter, whose nance the showing gave out, amidst the amazement tind, the Mayor, the Commissary of Police, and the Public Prosesistorical personages: the doctor verifying the miracle watch in but hurning it. The whole of the old primitive landscape of he Crotto was shown, the whole seene was set out with all its m the day when, kneeling before the Crotto during her vision, the had heedlessly left her hand on the flame of her candle withlint slie was in some measure forgotten. The painting represented lie seventeenth apparition of the Blessed Virgin to Bernadette, in the huge circular canvas, nearly five hundred feet in length, ver she went, and it was not until the showman who gave the rishors, and begun to walk round, relating the incident depicted isliers, and begun to walk round, relating the incident depicted as a sort of ovation around Marie; soft whispers, beatifical lances, a rapture of delight in seeing, following, and touching cr. Now glory had come, she would be loved in that way where une out into the diffuse light, filtering through a vellum, there touth to mouth. Up above, on the circular platform, when they store, who was already tamous, and whose name flew from me as themselves into the depths of the obscure corridor, several segmised in his daughter the girl so miraculously healed the day oticed that among the batch of pilgrims who dived at the same I, de Cucrsaint was full of innocent delight, especially when he Pierre to go in, Marie became as happy as a child; and even In the Rue St. Joseph, on perceiving the panorama, where the string crotto was depicted, with Bernadette kneeling down store it on the day of the miracle of the candle, the idea occurred affer illusion; then propagands, and the triumph of the sanctsailed a list; next the covert propulsion of human misery hungerirgin had shown herselff It was always the same story beginbe bidding of innocent closen children, to whom the Blessed mark which the driver of the cabriolet had made a short time reviously: "Lourdes has fong." That, in fact, was the question is the third all last long." That, in fact, was the question, show many venerated smechanics had thus been built already, at sow many venerated smechanics had thus been built already, at the many venerated smechanics had thus been built already. the public following him.

Then, by an unconscious transition of ideas, Pierre recalled the uary shining like a star; and afterwards decline, and oblivion. when the ecstatic dream of another visionary gave birth to another sanctuary elsewhere. It seemed as if the power of illusion wore away; that it was necessary in the course of centurics to displace it, set it amidst new scenery, under fresh circumstances, in order to renew its force. La Salette had dethroned the old wooden and stone Virgins that had healed; Lourdes had just dethroned La Salette, pending the time when it would be dethroned itself by Our Lady of to-morrow, she who will show her sweet consoling features to some pure child as yet unborn. Only, if Lourdes had met with such rapid, such prodigious fortune, it assuredly owed it to the little sincere soul, the delightful charm of Bernadette, Here there was no deceit, no falsehood, merely the blossoming of suffering, a delicate sick child who brought to the afflicted multitude her dream of justice and equality in the miraculous. She was merely eternal hope, eternal consolation. Besides, all historical and social circumstances seem to have combined to increase the need of this mystical flight at the close of a terrible century of positivist inquiry; and that was perhaps the reason why Lourdes would still long endure in its triumph, before becoming a mere! legend, one of those dead religions whose powerful perfume has evaporated.

Ahl that ancient Lourdes, that city of peace and belief, the only possible cradle where the legend could come into being, how easily Pierre conjured it up before him, whilst walking round the vast canvas of the Panoramai That canvas said everything; it was the best lesson of things that could be seen. The monotonous explanations of the showman were not heard; the landscape spoke for itself. First of all there was the Grotto, the rocky hollow beside the Gave, a savage spot suitable for reverie-bushy slopes and heaps of fallen stone, without a path among them; and nothing yet in the way of ornamentation-no monumental quay, no garden paths winding among trimly cut shrubs; no Grotto set in order, deformed, enclosed with iron railings; above all, no show for the sale of religious articles, that simony shop which was the scandal of all pious souls. The Virgin could not have selected a more solitary and charming nook wherein to show herself to the chosen one of her heart, the poor young girl who came thither still possessed by the dream of her painful nights, even whilst gathering dead wood. And on the opposite side of the Gave, behind the rock of the castle, was old Lourdes, confident and Another age was then conjured up: a small town, with narrow pebble-paved streets, black houses with marble dressings, and an antique semi-Spanish church, full of old carvings, and peopled with visions of gold and painted flesh. Communication with other places was only kept up by the Bagnères and Cauterets diligences, which twice a day forded the Lapaca to climb the steep causeway of the Rue Basse. The spirit of the century had not breathed on those peaceful roofs sheltering a belated poputes of the road. nesty, had flowered like a natural rose, budding on the eglantion which had remained childish, enclosed within the narrownits of strict religious discipline. There was no debauchery; a we mitque commerce sufficed for daily life, a poor life whose tdships were the safeguards of morality. And Pierre had never the safeguards of morality. And Pierre had never the understood how Bernadette, born in that land of faith and meety that flowered life a partial research that the safe and the safe and ey found themselves in the street again. "I'm not at all sorry "It's all the same very curious," observed M., de Cuersaint when ooks on her knees, in ecstasy, while the candle-flame licks her And how charming Bernadette te people were going to move. unk oneself there. Isn't it so, father? At times it seems as if Marie was also laughing with pleasure. "One would almost "Ji Wes uised Majesté to give him the preference; but that does not pre-vent us from making a few inquiries, Ehl Pierre, what do you Shall we take a look at the shops? We certainly prote must think of making our purchases, if we wish to buy anyngers without burning them."

"Let us see," said the architect; "we have only an hour left, so

"Ohl certainly, as you like," answered the priest. "Besides, it stood in strings on the pavement; the women were belted with gravings were reaping golden gains. The customers at the shops kers whose barrows were loaded with statuettes and sacred enmore particularly purchased were religious articles; and those hawcarried off as if swept away by the wind. But what the crowd was wheeling some cheese about on a small truck saw his goods bottles and greasy parcels until they almost burst. A hawker who Officer purchased fruit and wine; baskets were filled with open-air stalls where bread and suees of sausages and ham were viding themselves with provisions for the journey, elected the just breaking up amidst a ceaseless roll of vehicles, Many, prothe national pilgrimage streamed along the thoroughteres and besieged the shops in a final scramble. You would have taken the cries, the jostling, and the sudden rushes for those at some isir, chases before breakfast, so that it might have nothing but its departure to think of afterwards. The thousands of pilgrims of ways, where an entire people was hastening to complete its purhad just struck, and extraordinary animation reigned on the tootsparkling with brightness and noisy with the crowd. Ten o'clock light of the vellum had increased, to fall at last into new Lourdes, to another town, parted by centuries. He had left the solitude, the slumbering peacefulness of old Lourdes, which the dead seemed to him as if he had all at once been transported from one Panorama he felt as though he no longer knew where he was. And he thereupon followed the young girl and her father, who returned to the Plateau de la Merlasse. Since he had quitted the will give us a walk."

immense chaplets, had Blessed Virgins tucked under their arms, and were provided with cans which they meant to fill at the miraculous. spring. Carried in the hand or slung from the shoulder, some of them quite plain and others daubed over with a Lady of Lourdes in blue paint, these cans held from one to ten quarts apiece; and, shining with all the brightness of new tin, clashing, too, at times with the sharp jingle of stewpans, they added a gay note to the aspect of the noisy multitude. And the fever of dealing, the pleasure of spending one's money, of returning home with one's pockets crammed with photographs and medals, lit up all faces with a holiday expression, transforming the radiant gathering into a fair-field crowd with appetites either beyond control or satisfied.

On the Plateau de la Merlasse, M. de Guersaint for a moment felt tempted to enter one of the finest and most patronised shops, on the board over which were these words in large letters: "Soubi-rous, Brother of Bernadette."

"Eh! what if we were to make our purchases there? be more appropriate, more interesting to remember.

However, he passed on, repeating that they must see everything first of all.

Pierre had looked at the shop kept by Bernadette's brother with a heavy heart. It grieved him to find the brother selling the Blessed Virgin whom the sister had beheld. However, it was necessary to live, and he had reason to believe that, beside the triumphant Basilica resplendent with gold, the visionary's relatives were not making a fortune, the competition being so terrible. If on the one hand the pilgrims left millions behind them at Lourdes, on the other there were more than two hundred dealers in religious articles, to say nothing of the hotel and lodging-house keepers, to whom the largest part of the spoils fell; and thus the gain, so eagerly disputed, ended by heing moderate enough after all. Along the Plateau on the right and left of the repository kept by Bernadette's brother other shops appeared, an uninterrupted row of them, pressing one against the other, each occupying a division of a wooden structure a sort of gallery erected by the town, which derived from it some sixty thousand francs (£2400) a year. It formed a regular bazaar of open stalls, encroaching on the pavement so as to tempt people to stop as they passed along. For more than three hundred yards no other trade was plied: a river of chaplets, medals, and statuettes streamed without end behind the windows; and in enormous letters on the boards above appeared the venerated names of Saint Roch, Saint Joseph, Jerusalem, The Immaeulate Virgin, The Sacred Heart of Mary, all the names in Paradise that were most likely to touch and attract customers.

"Really," said M. de Guersaint, "I think it's the same thing all over the place. Let us go anywhere." He himself had enough of it, this interminable display was quite exhausting him.

"But as you promised to make the purchases at Majeste's," said

Marie, who was not in the least tired, "the best thing will be to our amado" than most machine oriold bloom mother this tail ing lightly to the ground, she exclaimed "The sain don't thank had a straight forchead, chubby checks, and full red line, Jump. hair and her supperts eyes, set in a some what square that, which nearing beautiful relion galoes. She was langling with the tighted the show them to a toung man beat of Holle got a place, was standing on a stool, taking some holy-water vases from and to outdo in each offer estimated by the change of the and bur, fact, one of the largest in the street, eccuping the ground floor.

Of the hotel on the left land. M. de Guershing and Pierre federre. And she was the first to enter the establishment, which was in "Cottinly, said Marie. "Set if qode Inditured a taley 552" 'ફેર્ક્યુક્ટ અનું દુરક્રમાં) કર "Then it's decided, we are going to make our purchase hesitated. In front of the Hotel of the Apparitions, M. de Guersaint again isələhin ənniş ənl hiqləs hirind Summir menh to salim braw bend boobin bun rodiom bewollol name adi raya saw daidw arwot bango bili lo stogias ogi ulguomi Avidsip som istalidate out pour spepaul out isationnes out of using v ong end to the other. And it seemed as if there would never be ment bear out the bright summys which capitaled the near them າກ ຮັບສຳ ວາເທ ຂໍ້ສະຕັ້ງວ່າ ຕັ້ງຄຸ້ງສາເຖິ ຮັບຄວາມຄຸວຖຸ ປະຄຸກັດ ຫົວເປັດ ຄົນດາຕາເຖິງສີເພດູເຄັ່ງຄຸ້ວ memory. In this proad, populous thoroughlare the crowd streamof which had had a wonderful success, which was still fresh in works published on Laurdes during the list inventy years, some commes penting devont titles, and among them the immurrable A bookseller displayed the last Catholic publications, Orders, mixed up with views of famous sites in the neighbouring the Basilica, and portraits of Bishops and reverend Fathers of all grapher's windows were crammed with views of the Grotto and -olodd A de Lourdes, with a figure of the Virgin on the cover, There was even a confectioner who sold hoxes of pastilles a fean drapers, and umbrella-makers, who also dealt in religious articles. they swarmed on both sides; and among them here here fewellers, "That's it; let's return to Majeste's place."
But the rows of shops began again in the Avenue do la Crotte.

other pattern. I shall not leave until to-morrow, and will come No, no," suswered the bearer, of he wint off.

of surprise and covert incredulity. Moneyer, like the clever sales, we man that she was, she was produce in complimentary retained. bole at her previous day, she became extremely there year a dech by the minds of reliant Madame Materia had been taking the bound apply same pile som pinel, tode much pullege, unit!

immense chaplets, had Blessed Virgins tucked under their arms, and were provided with cans which they meant to fill at the miraculous spring. Carried in the hand or slung from the shoulder, some of them quite plain and others daubed over with a Lady of Lourdes in blue paint, these cans held from one to ten quarts apiece; and, shining with all the brightness of new tin, elashing, too, at times with the sharp jingle of stewpans, they added a gay note to the aspect of the noisy multitude. And the fever of dealing, the pleasure of spending one's money, of returning home with one's poekets crammed with photographs and medals, lit up all faces with a holiday expression, transforming the radiant gathering into a fair-field crowd with appetites either beyond control or satisfied.

On the Plateau de la Merlasse, M. de Guersaint for a moment felt tempted to enter one of the finest and most patronised shops, on the board over which were these words in large letters: "Soubirous, Brother of Bernadette."

"Eh! what if we were to make our purchases there? be more appropriate, more interesting to remember."

However, he passed on, repeating that they must see everything first of all.

Pierre had looked at the shop kept by Bernadette's brother with a heavy heart. It grieved him to find the brother selling the Blessed Virgin whom the sister had beheld. However, it was necessary to live, and he had reason to believe that, beside the triumphant Basilica resplendent with gold, the visionary's relatives were not making a fortune, the competition being so terrible. on the one hand the pilgrims left millions behind them at Lourdes, on the other there were more than two hundred dealers in religious articles, to say nothing of the hotel and lodging house keepers, to whom the largest part of the spoils fell; and thus the gain, so cagerly disputed, ended by being moderate enough after all. Along the Plateau on the right and left of the repository kept by Bernadette's brother other shops appeared, an uninterrupted row of them, pressing one against the other, each occupying a division of a wooden structure a sort of gallery creeted by the town, which derived from it some sixty thousand francs (£2400) a year. It formed a regular bazaar of open stalls, encroaching on the pavement so as to tempt people to stop as they passed along. For more than three hundred yards no other trade was plied: a river of chaplets, medals, and statuettes streamed without end behind the windows; and in enormous letters on the boards above appeared the venerated names of Saint Roch, Saint Joseph, Jerusalem, The Immaculate Virgin, The Sacred Heart of Mary, all the names in Paradise that were most likely to touch and attract eustomers.

"Really," said M. de Guersaint, "I think it's the same thing all over the place. Let us go anywhere." He himself had enough of it, this interminable display was quite exhausting him.

"But as you promised to make the surchases at Majeste's" said viarie, who was not in the least tired, "the best thing will be to

"sould soussink of miner stol the shelf" through the streets of the entire town, which was ever the same sollowed intollier and indeed there were miles of them running a finish to the statueties, the medals and the chaplets; one display one end to the other. And it seemed as if there would never be high spirits amid the bright sunrays which enfiladed the road from ed along in more open order, their cans fingled, every one was in In this broad, populous thoroughtare the crowd streamof which had had a wonderful success, which was still fresh in volumes bearing devont titles, and among them the immunerable mountains. A pookseller displayed the last Catholic publications, Orders, mixed un with views of famous sites in the neighbouring the Basilica, and portraits of Bishops and reverend Fathers of all de Lourdes, with a figure of the Virgin on the cover A photo-There was even a confectioner who sold boxes of pastilles a lean drapers, and umbrella-makers, who also dealt in religious articles. they swamped on both sides; and among them here were sewellers, But the rows of shops began again in the Avenue de la Crotte.

"Then it's decided, we are going to make our purchashesitated, In front of the Hotel of the Apparitions, M. de Guersant again baxaar selling the same articles.

And she was the first to enter the establishment, which was, in "Rei fi gode listinia a beautiful shop it is!" es there?" he asked.

Apolline, the nicce of the Majestes, who was in charge of the fact, one of the largest in the street, occupying the ground floor of the hotel on the left land. M. de Guersaint and Pierre following lightly to the ground, she exclaimed: "Then you don't think this pattern would please madaine, your ainte?" had a straight forehead, chubby checks, and full red lips. Jumphair and her superb eyes, set in a somewhat square face, which a top shelf to show them to a young man, an elegant bearer, wearing beautiful yellow gaiters. She was laughing with the cooling sound of a dove, and looked charming with her thick black place, was standing on a stool, taking some holy-water vases from bestiere appearing that the state of the young person bestief what pattern. I shall not leave until to-morrow, and will come "No, no," answered the bearer, as he went off. "Obtain the of surprise and covert incredulity. However, like the elever selection that she was, she was produse in complimentary remarks. bold at her with her merry smile, in which there was a dash since the previous day, she became extremely attentive. by the minucle of whom Madame Majeste had been talking ever "Ah, mademoiselle, I shall be so happy to sell to you! Your miracle is so beautiful! Look, the whole shop is at your disposal:

We have the largest choice."

We have the largest choice."

Thank you," she replied, "you are faw small things."

very good. But we have only come to buy a few small things."
"If you will allow us," said M. de Guersaint, "we will choose ourselves.

"Very well, That's it, monsieur. Afterwards we will see!"

And as some other customers now came in, Apolline forgot them, returned to her duties as a pretty saleswoman, with caressing words and seductive glances, especially for the gentlemen, whom she never allowed to leave until they had their pockets full of purchases.

M. de Guersaint had only two francs left of the louis which Blanche, his eldest daughter, had slipped into his hand when he was leaving, as pocket-money; and so he did not dare to make any large selection. But Pierre declared that they would cause him great pain if they did not allow him to offer them the few things which they would like to take away with them from Lourdes. It was therefore understood that they would first of all choose a present for Blanche, and then Marie and her father should select the souvenirs that pleased them best.
"Don't let us hurry," repeated M. de Guersaint, who had become very gay. "Come, Marie, have a good look. What would be most likely to please Blanche?"

All three looked, searched, and rummaged. But the indecision increased as they went from one object to another. With its counters, show-cases, and nests of drawers, furnishing it from top to bottom, the spacious shop was a sea of endless billows, overflowing with all the religious knick-knacks imaginable. were the ehaplets: skeins of chaplets hanging along the walls, and heaps of chaplets lying in the drawers, from humble ones costing twenty sous a dozen, to those of sweet-scented wood, agate, and lapis lazuli, with chains of gold or silver; and some of them, of immense length, made to go twice round the neck or waist, had carved beads, as large as walnuts, separated by death's-heads. Then there were the medals: a shower of medals, boxes full of medals, of all sizes, of all metals, the cheapest and the most preeious. They bore different inscriptions, they represented the Basilica, the Grotto, or the Immaculate Conception; they were engraved, repoussées, or enamelled, executed with care, or made by the gross, according to the price. And next there were the Blessed Virgins, great and small, in zinc, wood, ivory, and especially plaster; some entirely white, others tinted in bright colours, in accordance with the description given by Bernadette; the amiable and smiling face, the extremely long veil, the blue sash, and the golden roses on the feet, there being, however, some slight modification in each model so as to guarantee the copyright. And there was another flood of other religious objects: a hundred

Pierre did not reply, but he was very much struck by these reflections, which at last gave him an explanation of a feeling of discomfort that he had experienced ever since his arrival at Lourdes. This discomfort arose from the difference between the modern surroundings and the faith of past ages which it was sought to resuscitate. He thought of the old eathedrals where quivered that faith of nations; he pictured the former attributes of worship—the images, the goldsmith's work, the saints in wood and stone-all of admirable power and beauty of expression. The fact was that in those ancient times the workmen had been true believers, had given their whole souls and lodies and all the candour of their feelings to their productions, just as M. de Guersaint said. But nowadays architects built churches with the same practical tranquility as they erected five-storey houses, precisely as the religious articles, the chaplets, the medals and the statuettes were manufactured by the gross in the populous quarters of Paris by merrymaking workmen who did not even follow their religion. And thus what slopwork, what toymakers,' ironmongers' stuff it all was! of a prettiness fit to make you cry, a silly sentimentality fit to make your heart turn with disgust! Lourdes was inundated, devastated, disfigured by it all to such a point as to quite unset persons with any delicacy of taste who happened to stray through its streets. It clashed jarringly with the attempted resuscitation of the legends, cememonies, and processions of dead ages; and all at once it occurred to Pierre that the social and historical condemnation of Lourdes lay in this, that faith is for ever dead among a neople when it no longer introduces it into the churches it builds or the chaplets it manufactures.

However, Marie had continued examining the shelves with the impatience of a child, hesitating, and finding nothing which seemed to her worthy of the great dream of eestasy which she would ever keep within her.

"Father," she said, "it is getting late; you must take me back to the Hospital; and to make up my mind, look, I will give Blanche this medal with the silver chain. After all, it's the most simple and prettiest thing here. She will wear it; it will make her a little piece of jewellery. As for myself, I will take this statuette of Our Lady of Lourdes, this small one, which is rather prettily painted. I shall place it in my room and surround it with fresh flowers. It will be very nice, will it not?"

M. de Guersaint approved of her idea, and then busied himself with his own choice. "Oh doord oh deard how embarroused I am!"

with his own choice. "Oh dearl oh dearl how embarrassed I am!"

said be.

He was examining some ivory-handled penholders capped with pea-like balls, in which were microscopic photographs, and while bringing one of the little holes to his eye to look in it he raised an exchanation of mingled surprise and pleasure. "Hallo! here's the Cirque de Gavarniel Ahl it's prodigious; everything is there; how can that colossal panorama have been got into so anall a space? Come, I'll take this perholder; it's curious, and vill remind me of my exeursion.

Pierre had simply chosen a portrait of Bernadette, the large abdograph which represents her on her knees in a black gown, with a handkerehief tied over her hair, and which is said to be no only one in existence taken from life. He hastened to pay, and they were all three on the point of leaving, when Madanie Ladanie has said to be not smid they were all three on the point of leaving, when Madanie laggeste cutered, protested, and positively insisted on making sood fortune. "I beg of you mademoiselle, take a scapulary," aid she. "Look among those there. The Blessed Virgin who shose you will repay me in good luck,"

She raised her voice and made so much fuss that the purchasers allong the shop were interested, and began gazing at the girl with mying the shop were interested, and began gazing at the girl with myious eyes, It was popularity butsting out again around her, a thatic a little present, saying that it would bring her establishment illing the shop were interested, and began gazing at the girl with navious eyes, it was popularity bursting out again around her, a sopularity which ended even by reaching the street, when the andlady went to the threshold of the shop making signs to the radespeople opposite and putting all the neighbourhood in a futter.

"Let us go," repeated Marie, feeling more and more uncombited as go," repeated Marie, feeling more and more uncontinuous.

ortable.
Shi Monsient Lybbe Des Nemojses!
Alt her father on noticing a priest come in, delained her.

It was in fact the handsome able, clad in a easoock of fine forth outting a, pleasant odour, and with an expression of soft saicty on his fresh-coloured face. He had not noticed his companion of the previous day, but had gone straight to Apolline and taken her on one side, And Pierre overheard him saying in a mbdued tone: "Why didn't you bring me my three dozen chaplers this morning?"

Apolline again began langhing with the cooing notes of a flow, and looked at him sideways, rognishly, without answering alove, and looked at him sideways, rognishly, without answering ins mornings.

Apolline again began langhing with the cooling notes of a fortine again began langhing with the cooling notes of a flow, and looked at him sideways, rognishly, without answering "They are for my little penitents at Toulouse. I wanted to place them at the bottom of my trank; and you offered to help my pack my linen."

She continued to the penitent of my trank; and you offered to help my pack my linen.

companions, ecclesiastics of slender means, good-natured fellows, who had much amused them. And the architect ended by reminding his new friend that he had kindly promised to induce a personage at Toulouse, who was ten times a millionaire, to interest himself in his studies on navigable balloons. "A first advance of a hundred thousand francs would be sufficient," he said.

"You can rely on me," answered Abbé Des Hermoises. "You will not have prayed to the Blessed Virgin in vain."

However, Pierre, who had kept Barnadette's portrait in his hand, had just then been struck by the extraordinary likeness between Apolline and the visionary. It was the same rather massive face, the same full thick mouth, and the same magnificent eves: and he recollected that Madame Majesté had already pointed out to him this striking resemblance, which was all the more peculiar as Apolline had passed through a similar poverty-stricken childhood at Bartrès before her aunt had taken her with her to assist in keeping the shop. Bernadettel Apollinel What a strange association, what an unexpected reincarnation at thirty years' distance! And, all at once, with this Apolline, who was so flightily merry and careless, and in regard to whom there were so many odd rumours, new Lourdes rose before his eyes: the coachmen, the eandle girls, the persons who let rooms and waylaid tenants at the railway station, the hundreds of furnished houses with discreet little lodgings, the crowd of free priests, the ladyhospitallers, and the simple passers-by, who came there to satisfy their appetites. Then, too, there was the trading mania excited by the shower of millions, the entire town given up to lucre, the shops transforming the streets into bazaars which devoured one another, the hotels living gluttonously on the pilgrims, even to the Blue Sisters who kept a table d'hôte, and the Fathers of the Grotto who coined money with their Godl What a sad and frightful course of events, the vision of pure Bernadette inflaming multitudes, making them rush to the illusion of happiness, bringing a river of gold to the town; and from that moment rotting everything. The breath of superstition had sufficed to make humanity flock thither, to attract abundance of money, and to currupt this honest corner of the earth for ever. Where the candid hily had formerly bloomed there now grew the earnal rose, in the new mould of cupidity and enjoyment. Bethlehem had become Sodom since an innocent child had seen the Virgin.

"Eh? What did I tell you?" exclaimed Madame Majesté, perceiving that Pierre was comparing her niece with the portrait.

"Apolline is Bernadette all overl"

The young girl approached with her amiable smile, flattered at first by the comparison.

"Lct's sce, let's scel" said Abbé Dcs Hermoises, with an air of lively interest.

He took the photograph in his turn, compared it with the girl, and then exclaimed in amaxement: "It's wonderful; the same features. I had not noticed it before, Really I'm delighted..."

"Still I fancy she had a larger nose," Apolline ended by remarking.

The Abbe then raised an exchanation of irresistible admirations:

"Ohl you are practier, much prettier, that's evident. But that

"Ohl you are prettier, much prettier, that's evident. But that does not matter, any one would take you for two sisters."

Pierre could not refrain from haughing, he thought the remark of prettier. All noot Bernadette was absolutely dead and she so peculiar. All poor Bernadette was absolutely dead, and she had no sister. She could not have been born again; it would have been hopossible for her to exist in the region of crowded life and passion which she had made.

At length Marie went off leaning on her father's ann, and it

At length Marie went off leaning on her father's arm, and it was agreed that they would both call and fetch her at the Hospital to go to the station together. More than fifty people were awaiting her in the street in a state of ecstasy. They bowed to her and followed her; and one woman even made her infirm child, and followed her; and one woman even made her infirm child, whom she was bringing back from the Crotto, touch her gown, whom she was bringing back from the Crotto, touch her gown, collected under the roofing of the spacious platform, a hundred yards in length, where all the benches were already covered with waiting pilgrims and their pareels. In the refreshment-room, at one end of the buildings, men were drinking beer and women ordering lemonade at the little tables which had been taken by assault, whilst at the other end bearers stood on guard at the goods entrance so as to keep the way clear for the speedy passage of the patients, who would soon be arriving. And all along the broad platform there was incessant coming and going, poor people rushing hither and thither in bewilderment, priests trotting along to render assistance, gentlemen in frock-coats looking on with quiet inquisitiveness: indeed, all the jumbling and jostling of the most mixed, most variegated throng ever elbowed in a railway station.

At three o'clock, however, the sick had not yet reached the station, and Baron Suire was in despair, his anxiety arising from the dearth of horses, for a number of unexpected tourists had arrived at Lourdes that morning and hired conveyances for Barèges, Cauterets, and Gavarnie. At last, however, the Baron espied Berthaud and Gérard arriving in all laste, after seouring the town; and when he had rushed up to them they soon pacified him by announcing that things were going splendidly. They had been able to procure the needful animals, and the removal of the patients from the Hospital was now being carried out under the most favourable eireumstances. Squads of bearers with their stretehers and little earts were already in the station yard, watching for the arrival of the vans, brakes, and other vehicles which had been recruited. A reserve supply of mattresses and eushions was, moreover, heaped up beside a lamp-post. Nevertheless, just as the first patients arrived, Baron Suire again lost his head, whilst Berthaud and Gérard hastened to the platform from which the train would start. There they began to superintend matters, and gave orders amidst an increasing scramble.

Father Foureade was on this platform, walking up and down alongside the train, on Father Massias's arm. Seeing Doetor Bonamy approach, he stopped short to speak to him: "Ah, doetor," said he, "I am pleased to see you. Father Massias, who is about to leave us, was again telling me just now of the extraordinary favour granted by the Blessed Virgin to that interesting young person, Mademoiselle Marie de Guersaint. There has not been such a brilliant miracle for years! It is signal good-fortune for us—a blessing which should render our labours fruitful. All Christendom will be illumined, comforted, enriched by it."

He was radiant with pleasure, and forthwith the doetor with his clean-shaven face, heavy peaceful features, and usually tired eyes, also began to exult: "Yes, your reverence, it is prodigious, prodigious! I shall write a pamphlet about it. Never was cure special trains, in addition to all the ordinary traffic, in which no

cliange had been made.

Pierre arrived, valise in hand, and found some difficulty in reaching the platform. He was alone, for Marie had expressed an ardent desire to kneel once more at the Grotto, so that her soul might burn with gratitude before the Blessed Virgin until the last moment; and so he had left M. de Guersaint to conduct her thither whilst he himself settled the hotel bill. Moreover, he had made them promise that they would take a fly to the station, and they would certainly arrive within a quarter of an hour. Meantime, his idea was to seck their carriage, and there rid himself of This, however, was not an easy task, and he only recognised the carriage eventually by the placard which had been swinging from it in the sunlight and the storms during the last three days-a square of pasteboard bearing the names of Madame de Jonquière and Sisters Hyaeinthe and Clairc des Anges. could be no mistake, and Pierre again pictured the compartments full of his travelling companions. Some cushions already marked M. Sabathier's corner, and on the seat where Marie had experienced such suffering he still found some scratches caused by the ironwork of her box. Then, having deposited his valise in his own place, he remained on the platform waiting and looking around him, with a slight feeling of surprise at not perceiving Doctor Chassaigne, who had promised to come and embrace him before the train started.

Now that Marie was well again Pierre had laid his bearerstraps aside, and merely wore the red cross of the pilgrimage on his cassock. The station, of which he had caught but a glimpse in the livid dawn amidst the anguish of the terrible morning of their arrival, now surprised him by its spacious platforms, its broad exits, and its clear gaiety. He could not see the mountains, but some verdant slopes rose up on the other side, in front of the waiting-rooms; and that afternoon the weather was delightfully mild, the sky of a milky whiteness, with light fleecy clouds veiling the sun, whence there fell a broad diffuse light, like a nacreous, pearly dust: "maiden's weather," as country folk are wont to say.

The big clock had just struck three, and Pierre was looking at it, when he saw Madame Désagneaux and Madame Volmar arrive, followed by Madaine de Jonquière and her daughter. These ladies, who had driven from the Hospital in a landau, at once began looking for their carriage, and it was Raymonde who first recognised the first-class compartment in which she had travelled from Paris. "Mamma, mamma, here, here it is!" she called. "Stay a little while with us; you have plenty of time to instal yourself among your patients, since they haven't 'yet arrived.'

Pierre now again found himself face to face with Madame Volmar, and their glances met. However, he gave no sign of recognition, and on her side there was but a slight sudden droop-added, "You ought to come as well, my dear. It would be so nic to meet there all together.

But, with a slow wave of the hand and an air of weary indifference, Madame Volmar answered, "Oh! my holiday is all over; am going home."

Just then her eyes again met those of Pierre, who had remaine standing near the party, and he fancied that she became cor fused, whilst an expression of indescribable suffering passed ove her lifeless face.

The Sisters of the Assumption were now arriving, and the ladie joined them in front of the cantine van. Ferrand, who had com with the Sisters from the Hospital, got into the van, and the helped Sister Saint-François to mount upon the somewhat high footboard. Then he remained standing on the threshold of th van-transformed into a kitchen and containing all sorts of sup plies for the journey, such as bread, broth, milk, and chocolatewhilst Sister Hyacinthe and Sister Claire des Anges, who wer still on the platform, passed him his little medicine-chest and some small articles of luggage.

"You are sure you have everything?" Sister Hyacinthe asker him. "All right. Well, now you only have to go and lie down in your corner and get to sleep, since you complain that you services are not utilised."

Ferrand began to laugh softly. "I shall help Sister Saint François," said hc. "I shall light the oil-stove, wash the crockery carry the cups of broth and milk to the patients whenever we stop, according to the time-table hanging yonder; and if, all the same, you should require a doctor, you will please come to fetel mc."

Sister Hyacinthe had also begun to laugh. "But we no longer require a doctor, since all our patients are cured," she replied, and, fixing her eyes on his, with her calm, sisterly air, she added,

"Good-bye, Monsieur Ferrand."

He smiled again, whilst a feeling of deep emotion brought moisture to his eyes. The tremulous accents of his voice expressed his conviction that he would never be able to forget this journey, his joy at having seen her again, and the souvenir of divine and eternal affection which he was taking away with him. "Good-bye, Sister," said he.

Then Madame de Jonquière talked of going to her carriage with Sister Claire des Anges and Sister Hyacinthe; but the latter assured her that there was no hurry, since the sick pilgrims were as yet scarcely arriving. She left her, therefore, taking the other Sister with her, and promising to see to everything. Morcover, she even insisted on ridding the superintendent of her little bag, saying that she would find it on her scat when it was time for her to come. Thus the ladies continued walking and chatting gaily on the broad platform, where the atmosphere was so plcasant.

Pierre, however, his eyes fixed upon the big clock, watched the minutes hasten by on the dial, and began to feel surprised at not seeing Marie arrive with her father. It was to be hoped that M de Gnersaint would not lose himself on the road!

The young priest was still watching, when, to his surprise, he canglit of M. Vigneron, in a state of perfect exasperation, pushing his wife and little Gustave furnonsly before him. "Oh, Monsieut l'Abbé," he explained, "tell me where our car-

Then, on reaching the second-class compartment, he caught tinge isl. Help me to put our luggage and this child in it. I am at my wit's endl. They have made me altogether lose my temper."

that they already make large enough reductions on the pilgrimage regulation time. But they pretend that it doesn't concern them, was of no use my telling them about the accident. As it is, it's by no means pleasant to have to stay with that corpse, watch over it, see it put in a coffin, and remove it to-morrow within the believe it? They insist on my starting. They tell me that my return teket will not be available it I wait here till to-morrow. It Дրеу լей те that туу little Custave inside, and quite an outburst followed. "Could you hold of Pierre's hands, just as the young man was about to place

Aladame Vigneron stood all of a tremble listening to him, ងព្រះព្រង tickets, and that they can't enter into any questions of people

whilst Gustave, forgotten, statggering on his eruteh with fatigue, raised his poor, inquisitive, suffering face.

them to-day, like an article of luggagel I am therefore absolutely obliged to remany stupid and them, it's a case of compulsion. What do they expect me to do with that corpse? I can't take it under my arm, and bring it with that corpse? I can't take it under my arm, and bring it

They were never able to find him. of the secumple. "Have you spoken to the station-master?" asked Pierre.
"The station-master! Oh! he's somewhere about, in the midst Tieked people there, arell Still, I mean to rout him out, and give him a bit of my mind!" confg You have anything done properly in such a bear-garden?

than before, consumed by sorge, and so full of pain, raised a faint cry. "Oh, my dear child, have I hart you?" asked Pierre "No, no, Monsieur PAbbé, but I've been moved about so much to-day and I'm very tired this afternoon." As he spoke he to-day and I'm very tired this afternoon." poor little fellow, who was as light as a bitd, seemingly thinner Oct in, so that we may pass you the youngster and the parcels!"
With these words he pushed her in, and threw the parcels after her, whilst the young priest took Gustave in his arms. The Then, perceiving his veite standing beside him motionless, glued as it were to the platform, he eried: "What are you doing there?"

then, sinking back into his corner, closed his eyes, exhausting done for, by this fearful trip to Lourdes. singled with his usual intelligent and mountful espression and

"As you can very well understand," now resumed M. Vigneroi, "it by no means amuses me to stay here, kicking my hecls, while my wife and my son go back to Paris without me. They have to go, however, for life at the hotel is no longer bearable; and besides, if I kept them with me, and the railway people won't listen to reason, I should have to pay three extra fares. And to make matters worse, my wife hasn't got much brains. I'm afraid she won't be able to manage things properly."

Then, almost breathless, he overwhelmed Madame Vigneron with the most minute instructions-what she was to do during the journey, how she was to get back home on arriving in Paris, and what steps she was to take if Gustave should have another attack. Somewhat seared, she responded, in all docility, to each

But all at once her husband's rage came back to him. "After all," he shouted, "what I want to know is whether my return ticket be good or not! I must know for certain! They must find that station-master for mel"

He was already on the point of rushing away through the crowd, when he noticed Gustave's crutch lying on the platform. This was disastrous, and he raised his eyes to heaven as though to eall Providence to witness that he would never be able to extricate himself from such awful complications. And, throwing the crutch to his wife, he hurried off, distracted and shouting, "There, take it! You forget everything!"

The sick pilgrims were now flocking into the station, and, as on the oceasion of their arrival, there was endless, disorderly earting along the platform and across the lines. All the abominable ailments, all the sores, all the deformities, went past once more, neither their gravity nor their number seeming to have decreased; for the few cures which had been effected were but like a faint inappreciable gleam of light amidst the general mourning. They were taken back as they had come. The little earts, laden with helpless old women with their bags at their feet, grated over the rails. The stretchers on which you saw inflated bodies and pale faces with glittering eyes, swayed amidst the jostling of the throng. There was wild and senseless haste, indescribable confusion, questions, calls, sudden running, all the whirling of a flock which cannot find the entrance to the pen. And the bearers ended by losing their heads, no longer knowing which direction to take amidst the warning eries of the porters, who at each moment were frightening people, distracting them with anguish. "Take care, take care over there! Make haste! No, no, don't cross! The Toulouse train, the Toulouse train!"

Retracing his steps, Pierre again perceived the ladies, Madame de Jonquière and the others, still gaily chatting together. Lingering near them, he listened to Berthaud, whom Father Fourcade had stopped, to congratulate him on the good order which had been maintained throughout the pilgrimage. The ex-public prose-face of a mummy slowly liquefying; and, indeed, you might have thought that she was being taken back diminished, shrunken more and more to the proportions of a child, by the march of that horrible disease which, after destroying her bones, was now dissolving the softened fibres of her muscles. Inconsolable, bowed down by the loss of their last hope, her husband and sister, their eyes red, were following her with Abbé Judaine, even as one follows a corpse to the grave.

follows a corpse to the grave.

"No, no! not yet!" said the old priest to the bearers, in order to prevent them from placing the box in the carriage. "She will have time enough to roll along in there. Let her have the warmth of that lovely sky above her till the last possible moment."

Then, seeing Pierre near him, he drew him a few steps aside, and, in a voice broken by grief, resumed: "Ah! I am indeed distressed. Again this morning I had a hope. I had her taken to the Grotto, I said my mass for her, and came back to pray till eleven o'cloek. But nothing eame of it; the Blessed Virgin did not listen to me. Although she eured me; a poor uscless old man like me, I could not obtain from her the cure of this beautiful, young, and wealthy woman, whose life ought to be a continual fête. Undoubtedly the Blessed Virgin knows what she ought to do better than ourselves, and I bow myself and bless her name. Nevertheless my soul is full of frightful sadness."

He did not tell everything; he did not confess the thought which was upsetting him, simple, childish, worthy man that he was, whose life had never been troubled by either passion or doubt. But his thought was that those poor weeping people, the husband and the sister, had too many millions, that the presents they had brought were too costly, that they had given far too much money to the Basilica. A miraele is not to be bought. The wealth of the world is a hindranee rather than an advantage when you address yourself to God. Assuredly, if the Blessed Virgin had turned a deaf ear to their entreaties, had shown them but a stern, cold countenance, it was in order that she might the more attentively listen to the weak voices of the lowly ones who had come to her with empty hands, with no other wealth than their love, and these she had loaded with grace, flooded with the glowing affection of her Divine Motherhood. And those poor wealthy ones, who had not been heard, that sister and that husband, both so wretched beside the sorry body they were taking away with them, they themselves felt like pariahs among the throng of the humble who had been consoled or healed; they seemed embarrassed by their very luxury, and recoiled, awkward and ill at ease, eovered with shame at the thought that Our Lady of Lourdes had relieved beggars whilst never casting a glanee upon that beautiful and powerful lady agonising unto death amidst all her lacel

All at once it occurred to Pierre that he might have missed seeing M. de Guersaint and Marie arrive, and that they were

"Thank you, genilemen," said he. "That's over, thank goodness, consolate though very calm, at once settled himself in his comer. Serard into a perspiration. The ex-professor, who looked disearrage, a laborious task which put both the young priest and I. Sabathier in a little handeart, Pierre helped to place him in the he arrival of their charges, and as Cerard just then brought up vas still only his value on the seat. Sister Hyacinthe and Sister Jaire des Anges, however, had begun to install themselves pending erhaps; already in the carriage. He returned thither, but there After wrapping a rug round his legs, Madame Sabathier, who was also there, got out of the carriage and remained standing near the open door. She was talking to Pierre when all at once she broke the And now they'll only have to take me out at Paris."

unhappy little woman." off to say, "Ahl here's Madame Maze coming to take her seat. She sa very

"No no, I'm not going," said she. laughed, and gesticulated as though she were out of her senses. Then, in an obliging spirit, she called to her and offered to watch over her things. But Madanie Maze shook her head,

"What you are not going back?"

"No, no, I am not going-that is I am, but not with you, not dive diver he has come to letch me, he is taking me with him. Yes, yes, overthowing, she taised a cry: "I am going off with him! Yes, into which desertion had plunged her. And, at last, her joy ten years younger, suddenly aroused from the infinite sadness Her fair, prematurely faded face was radiant, she seemed to be Pierre and Madame Sabathier found it difficult to recognise her. The wore such an extraordinary air, she looked so bright, that purchasing some nevypapers. "There, that's my husband," said she, "that handsome man who's laughing over there with the newspaper-gul. He turned up here early this morning, and lie's carrying me off. We shall take the Toulouse train in a couple of minutes. My door and take the train in a couple of tooking young man, with gay eyes and bright red lips, who was Then, with a rapturous glance, she pointed out a dark, sturdy-We are going to Luchon together, together!"

However, she could not remain silent, but again spoke of the frightful lefter which she had received on Sunday, a letter in which he had declared to her that if she should take advantage of her colours and the hear that it she should take advantage. vou can understand my happiness, can't you?" minutes. Ahl dear madame, I told you all my worner, and

Blessed Virgin to let her die, for she knew that the faithless one of her sojourn at Lourdes to come to Lucinon arter inin, he would been a not open the door to her. And, think of it, theirs had been a love match! But for ten years he had neglected her, profiting by his continual journeys as a commercial traveller to take friends about with him from one to the other and of France. Ah! that time she had thought it all over, she had asked the Heart and the profit of the last that the faithfree one she had asked the of her sojourn at Lourdes to come to Luchon after him, he would

was at that very moment at Luchon with two friends. What was it, then, that had happened? A thunderbolt must certainly have fallen from Heaven. Those two friends must have received a warning from on high-perhaps they had dreamt that they were already condemned to everlasting punishment. At all events they had fled one evening without a word of explanation, and he, unable to live alone, had suddenly been seized with a desire to fetch his forsaken wife and keep her with him for a week. Grace must have certainly fallen on him, though he did not say it, for he was so kind and pleasant that she could not do otherwise than believe in a real beginning of conversion.

"Ah! how grateful I am to the Blessed Virgin," she continued; "she alone can have acted, and I well understood her last evening, It seemed to me that she made me a little sign just at the very moment when my husband was making up his mind to come here to fetch me. I asked him at what time it was that the idea occurred to him, and the hours fit in exactly. All there has been no greater miracle. The others make me smile with their mended legs and their vanished sores. Blessed be Our Lady of Lourdes, who has healed my heart!"

Just then the sturdy young man turned round, and she darted . away to join him, so full of delight that she forgot to bid the others good-bye. And it was at this moment, amidst the growing crowd of patients whom the bearers were bringing, that the Toulouse train at last came in. The tumult increased, the confusion became extraordinary. Bells rang and signals worked, whilst the station-master was seen rushing up, shouting with all the strength of his lungs: "Be careful there! Clear the line

A railway employé had to rush from the plaform to push a little vehicle, which had been forgotten on the line, with an old woman in it, out of harm's way; however, yet another scared band of pilgrims ran aeross when the steaming, growling engine was only thirty yards distant. Others, losing their heads, would have been crushed by the wheels if porters had not roughly caught them by the shoulders. Then, without having pounded anybody, the train at last stopped alongside the mattresses, pillows, and cushions lying hither and thither, and the bewildered, whirling groups of people. The carriage doors opened and a torrent of travellers alighted, whilst another torrent elimbed in these two obstinately contending currents bringing the tumult to a climax. Faces, first wearing an inquisitive expression, and then overcome by stupefaction at the astonishing sight, showed themselves at the windows of the doors which remained closed: and, among them, one especially noticed the faces of two remarkably pretty girls, whose large candid eyes ended by expressing the most dolorous compassion.

Followed by her husband, however Madame Maze had climbed into one of the carriages, feeling as happy and huoyant as if she

ed him. "Yes, yes, I am late. But ten minutes ago, just as I arrived, I caught sight of that eccentric fellow, the Commander, and had a talk with him over yonder. He was sneering at the and a talk with him over yonder. He was sneering at the sight of your people taking the train again to go and die at home, when, said he, they ought to have done so before coming to Lourdes. Well, all at once, while he was talking like this, he fell on the ground before me. It was his third attack of paralysis; the one he had long been expecting."

"Oh! mon Dieu," murmured Abbé Judaine, who heard the doctor, "he was blaspheming. Heaven has punished him."

M. de Guersaint and Mario were listening greatly interested.

M. de Guersaint and Marie were listening, greatly interested and deeply moved.

"I had him earried yonder, into that shed," continued the doctor. "It is all over; I can do nothing. He will doubtless be dead before a quarter of an hour has gone by. But I thought of a priest, and hastened up to you." Then, turning towards Abbé Judaine, M. Chassaigne added: "Come with me, Monsieur le Curé; you know him. We cannot let a Christian depart unsuccoured. Perhaps he will be moved, recognise his error, and become reconciled with God."

Abbé Judaine quickly followed the doctor, and in the rear went M. de Guersaint, leading Marie and Pierre, whom the thought of this tragedy impassioned. All five entered the goods shed, at twenty paces from the crowd which was still bustling and buzzing, without a soul in it suspecting that there was a man dying so near by.

In a solitary corner of the shed, between two piles of sacks filled with oats, lay the Commander, on a mattress borrowed from the Hospitality's reserve supply. He wore his everlasting frock-coat, with its buttonhole decked with a broad red riband, and somebody who had taken the precaution to pick up his silver-knobbed walking stick, had carefully placed it on the ground beside the mattress.

Abbé Judaine at once leant over him. "You recognise us, you can hear us, my poor friend, can't you?" asked the priest.

Only the Commander's eyes now appeared to be alive; but they were alive, still glittering brightly with stubborn flame of energy. The attack had this time fallen on his right side, almost entirely depriving him of the power of speech. He could only stammer a few words, by which he succeeded in making them understand that he wished to die there, without being moved or worried any further. He had no relative at Lourdes, where nobody knew anything either of his former life or his family. For three years he had lived there happily on the salary attaching to his little post at the station, and now he at last beheld his ardent, his only desire approaching fulfilment—the desire that he might depart and fall into the eternal sleep. His eyes expressed the great joy he felt at being so near his end.

"Have you any wish to make known to us?" resumed Abbe eath was at last at hand, ready to deliver him from his hatcful "What a beautiful day for departurel" And now that Thenever he saw the sun shine he was wont to say in an envious or three years past he had never got up in the morning without apping that by night-time he would be sleeping in the cometery. No, no; his eyes replied that he was all right, well pleased. idaine. "Cannot we be useful to you in any way?"

"I can do nothing, science is powerless. He is condemned," astence, it was indeed welcome.

tid Doctor Chassaigne in a low, bitter tone to the old priest, who egged him to attempt some effort.

xased shaking, she offered it to the man, nearer, and, taking hold of her can with her hands, which never lepths of her dim, vague eyes; and with the sisterly feelings of me who was very aged and suffered very grievously she drew Then a gleam of grandmotherly kindliness appeared in the the stood looking at that outstretched, stiffened man, who was ope of yet prolonging her old age, in spite of all its frightful easy. For a moment her senile, imbecile mind was quite scared. f Lourdes water, which she was taking away with her, in the ne assistance of a stick, and at her side was slung a can full ilments of extreme old age, she was dragging herself along with educed to the stature of childhood's days, afflicted with all the Thither she was going, entered the shed. Lame and humpbacked, pilgrim of fourscore years, who had lost her way and knew not However, at that same moment it chanced that an aged woman, conviction that if the Commander would only drink that water he heard by the Blessed Virgin, now glowed with fresh faith in the and so often for the cure of Madame Diculatay without being He, who had prayed so fervently n inspiration from on high. To Abbé Judaine this seemed like a sudden flash of light, creet once more, so that you may yet spend many years upon His power to you; God will work the great miracle of setting you concile yourself with God, drink and pray, whilst we ourselves implore the divine mercy with our whole souls. God will prove brother!" he said, "it is God who has sent you this woman. Re-The old priest fell upon his knees beside the mattress. 0,, would be cured.

you died, You turned your face to the wall and quietly in your bed. a year, ten years longer! It was so pleasant, so simple to die from afar, through so many fatigues, in order to drag themselves on the ground and sob and beg Heaven to let them live a month, spow pimself as cowardly as those flocks of pilgrims who came No, nol the Commander's sparkling eyes cried no! He, indeed, this earth, loving Him and glorifying Him."

"Drink, O my brother, I implore you!" continued the old priest.

sy cold all would have seemed had he but for a single moment

Deeply grieved that his entreaties should have been of no avail, Abbé Judaine painfully rose up. It had scemed to him that he Commander was now fixing his bright eyes upon Marie. hought that he might not meet them there.

he priest wished to show the dying man an example of that goodness of God which he repulsed.

"Yes, it is the "You recognise her, do you not?" he asked.

trayed from Marie's young face, on which one read such great The Commander could not answer; but his eyes no longer lead? would you have advised her not to drink the water?" caling to youth, to the long life she was born to live. Do you o beautiful, Heaven has taken pity on her, and now she is And you see her now, so full of health, so strong, naralysed. voung lady who arrived here on Saturday so ill, with both legs young creature. All poor woman, how many times, perhaps, night she regret that she had not died in her twendeth year! o pity, by the thought of all the sorrows which awaited this t she should be cured, she might be happy. It was the tender-ness of an old man, who knows the miseries of this world, stured mder their lids, and rolled down his cheeks, which were already sold. He was certainly weeping for her; he must have been thinking of that other miracle which he had wished her—that norrows; and tears appeared in those fixed eyes of his, gathered nappiness at having resuscitated, such vast hopes in countless turned, and died. coming; the mind was departing with the breath. He slightly last pitiful tears had dissolved thom. It was the end; coma was Then the Commander's eyes grew yery dim, as though those starting, he said; "make haste, make haste!"

Doctor Chassaigne at once drew Marie aside, "The train's

quested two bearers to watch the body, which would be removed later on when the train had gone, desired to accompany his friends the growing tumult of the erowd. And the doctor, having re-Indeed, the loud ringing of a bell was clearly resounding above to their carriage,

vellously yesterday." Cuersaint, your reverence, the young lady who was healed so maronce more, and this time by Doctor Bonamy, who triumphantly presented her to Futher Fourcade. "Here is Mademoiselle de They hastened their steps. Abbé Judaine, who was in despair, joined them after saying a short prayer for the repose of that rebellious soul. However, while Marie, followed by Pierre and Al. de Guersaint, was running along the platform, she was stopped and the first time by Determine and the platform, she was stopped and the first time by Determine and the platform and the platf decisive victory appeared on Father Foureade's face. "I know, I was there," he replied. "God has blessed you among The radiant smile of a general who is reminded of his most all women, my dear daughter; go and cause His name to b

Then he congratulated M. de Guersaint, whose paternal prid savoured divine enjoyment. It was the ovation beginning afres, the concert of loving words and enraptured glances which ha followed the girl through the streets of Lourdes that morning, an Th which again surrounded her at the moment of departure. bell might go on ringing; a circle of delighted pilgrims stilingered around her; it seemed as if she were carrying away is her person all the glory of the pilgrimage, the triumph of religion which would ccho and echo to the four corners of the earth.

And Pierre was moved as he noticed the dolorous group which Madame Jousseur and M. Dieulafay formed near by. Their cyc were fixed upon Marie; like the others, they were astonished by the resurrection of this beautiful girl, whom they had seen lying inert, emaciated, with ashen face. Why should that child have been healed? Why net the young woman, the dear woman, whon they were taking home in a dying state? Their confusion, their sense of shame seemed to increase; they drew back, uneasy, lik parials burdened with too much wealth; and it was a great relie for them when, three bearers having with difficulty places Madame Dieulafay in the first-class compartment, they themselve were able to vanish into it in company with Abbé Judaine.

The employés were already shouting, "Take your seats! take your seats!" and Father Massias, the spiritual director of the train had returned to his compartment, leaving Father Foureade on the platform leaning on Doctor Bonamy's shoulder. In all haste Gerard and Berthaud again saluted the ladies, while Raymonde got in to join Madame Desagneaux and Madame Volmar in their corner; and Madame de Jonquière at last ran off to her carriage, which she reached at the same time as the Guersaints. There was hustling, and shouting, and wild running from one to the other end of the long train, to which the engine, a copper engine, glittering like a star, had just been coupled.

Pierre was helping Marie into the carriage, when M. Vigneron, coming back at a gallop, shouted to him: "It'll be good to-morrow, it'll be good to-morrow!" Very red in the face, he showed and waved his ticket, and then galloped off again to the compartment where his wife and son had their seats, in order to announce the good news to them.

When Marie and her father were installed in their places, Pierre lingered for another moment on the platform with Doctor Chassaigne, who embraced him paternally. The young man wished to induce the doctor to return to Paris and take some "No, no, my dear child," he replied. "I shall remain here. They are here, they keep me here." He was speaking of his dear lost ones. Then, very gently and lovingly, he said, "Farewell."

"Not farewell, my dear doctor; till we meet again."

hing can be so sweet as to die, but to die in order to live Yes, yes, farewell. The Commander was right, you know;

However, a voice inquired, "And tly avaiting the departure. front of her husband, who, with his eyes half closed, was parire all three there. Madame Sabathier, too, had taken her seat La Crivotte, Elise Rouquet, and Sophie Conteau Jonquière and Sister Hyacinthe were counting their party in distracted, breathless, and covered with perspiration. Madame me the supreme seramble, the torrent of belated pilgrims rushing perions tones, "Take your seats! take your seats!" and now outs of the railway employes were ringing out in more and more ys on the foremost and hindmost carriages of the train; the Baron Suire was now giving orders for the removal of the white or of the cantine van, exclaimed: "Here she comes!" Thereupon Sister Hyacinthe, who was leaning out of the winadame Vincent, isn't she going back with usi'

erre glanced at her arms. They carried nothing now. Madame Vincent crossed the lines, rushed up, the last of all, eathless and haggard. And at once, by an involuntary impulse, of the Assumption elapped their hands, and the hymn of gratifude, the "Magnificat," began, sung by all the eight hundred pilgrims: we'll come back again!" was the cry; and then the gay little Sisters turbulent display of happiness, Eughter and shouts, overflowed from all the crowded carriages, "Till next year! We'll come back," one had carriages, "Till next year! We'll come back," wretched ones thirsting for life, And so a last outburst of joy, a Inextinguishable love, invincible hepe glowed within all these Blessed Virgin had simply deferred a cure for their souls henefit. gotten ones confinned as keen as ever in the conviction that the to-morrows. Even after those three days of burning entreaty their fever of desire remained within them; the faith of the forwould surely come; yesterday's miracle was the formal promise of quite gay, triumphant at the cure of the others. Their own turns brotherly and sisterly feelings; those who were not cured waxed events, for an hour, And not the slightest jealousy tainted their seen prought, they went off relieved and happy, at peq they 92 same condition भ्या yewe uı цэхсп Though most of them were he sick appeared to be healed. he point of starting for the legendary paradise. No bitterness, put a divine, infantile gaiety attended the departure. All he whole train resplendent, gilding the engine, which seemed on itherto veiled from sight, dissipated the light cloudlets and made oud whistle, shrill and joyous; and at that moment the sun, Panting and smoking, the engine gave vent to a first te carriages were full, and only the signal for departure was All the doors were being closed, slammed one after the other;

"Magnificat anima mea Dominum." "My soul doth magnify the Lord.

Thereupon the station-master, his mind at last at ease, harms hanging beside him, caused the signal to be given. The engine whistled once again and then set out, rolling along in the engine whisued once again and then set out, forming along in the dazzling sunlight as amidst a glory. Although his leg was causir him great suffering, Father Fourcade had remained on the platform, leaning upon Doetor Bonamy's shoulders, and, in spite everything, saluting the departure of his dear children with smile. Berthaud, Gérard, and Baron Suire formed another ground anothe and near them were Doetor Chassaigne and M. Vigneron wavir their handkerchiefs. Heads were looking joyously out of the windows of the fleeing carriages, whenee other handkerehie were streaming in the current of air produced by the motic of the train. Madame Vigneron compelled Gustave to sho his pale little face, and for a long time Raymonde's small han could be seen waying good wishes; but Marie remained the las looking back on Lourdes as it grew smaller and smaller amid

Across the bright countryside the train triumphantly disappea ed, resplendent, growling, chanting at the full pitch of its eigl hundred voices: "Et exsultavit spiritus meus in Deo salutari meo

"And my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviourl"

$\mathbf{N}$

MARIE'S VOW

Once more was the white train rolling, rolling towards Paris or its way home; and the third-class carriage, where the shrill voice singing the "Magnificat" at full pitch rose above the growling of the wheels, had again become a common room, a travelling hospital ward, full of disorder, littered like an improvised ambulance. Basins and brooms and sponges lay about under the seats which half concealed them. Articles of luggage, all the wretched mass of poor worn-out things, were heaped together, a little bijeverywhere; and up above the litter began again, what with the parcels, the baskets, and the bags hanging from the brass pegs and swinging to and fro without a moment's rest. The same Sister of the Assumption and the same lady-hospitallers were there with their patients, amidst the contingent of healthy pilgrims, who were already suffering from the overpowering heat and unbearable odour. And at the far end there was again the compartment full of women, the ten close-packed female pilgrims, some young

"Thus, for my own part," he continued, "during our long journey from Paris I tried to divert my thoughts by counting the bands in the roofing up there. There were thirteen from the lamp to the door. Well, I have just been counting them again, and naturally enough there are still thirteen. It's like that brass knob beside me. You can't imagine what dreams I had whilst I watched it shining at night-time when Monsieur l'Abbé was reading the story of Bernadette to us. Yes, I saw myself cured; I was making that journey to Rome which I have been talking of for twenty year's past; I walked and travelled the world—briefly, I had all manner of wild and delightful dreams. And now here we are on our way back to Paris, and there are thirteen bands across the roofing there, and the knob is still shining—all of which tells me that I'm again on the same seat, with my legs lifeless. Well, well, it's understood, I'm a poor, old, used-up animal, and such I shall remain."

Two big tears appeared in his eyes; he must have been passing through an hour of frightful bitterness. However, he raised his big square head, with its jaw typical of patient obstinacy, and added: "This is the seventh year that I have been to Lourdes, and the Blessed Virgin has not listened to me. No matter! It won't prevent me from going back next year. Perhaps she will at last deign to hear me.

For his part he did not revolt. And Pierre, whilst chatting with him, was stupefied to find persistent, tenacious credulity springing up once more, in spite of everything, in the cultivated brain of this man of intellect. What ardent desire of cure and life was it that had led to this refusal to accept evidence, this determination to remain blind? He stubbornly clung to the resolution to be saved when all human probabilities were against him, when the experiment of the miracle itself had failed so many times already; and he had reached such a point that he wished to explain his fresh rebuff, urging moments of inattention at the Grotto, a lack of sufficient contrition, and all sorts of little transgressions which must have displeased the Blessed Virgin. Moreover, he was already deciding in his mind that he would perform a novena somewhere next year, before again repairing to Lourdes.

"Ah! by the way," he resumed, "do you know of the good-luck which my substitute has had? Yes, you must remember my telling you about that poor fellow suffering from tuberculosis, for whom I paid fifty francs when I obtained hospitalisation for myself. Well, he has been thoroughly cured."

"Really! And he was suffering from tuberculosis!" exclaimed

M. dc Guersaint.

"Certainly, monsieur, perfectly cured! I had seen him looking so low, so yellow, so emaciated, when we started; but when he came to pay me a visit at the Hospital he was quite a new man; and, dear me, I gave him five francs."

Pierre had to restrain a smile, for he had heard the story from with thanksgivings for that happy day, and, at last, a prayer for the living and for the faithful departed.

"I warn you," then resumed the Sister, "that when we get to Lamothe, at ten o'clock, I shall order silence. However, I think you will all be very good and won't require any rocking to get to sleep."

This made them laugh. It was now half-past eight o'clock, and the night had slowly covered the country-side. The hills alone retained a vague trace of the twilight's farewell, whilst a dense sheet of darkness blotted out all the low ground. Rushing on at full speed, the train entered an immense plain, and then there was nothing but that sea of darkness, through which they ever and ever rolled under a blackish sky, studded with stars.

For a moment or so Pierre had been astonished by the demennour of La Grivotte. While the other pilgrims and patients were already dozing off, sinking down amidst the luggage, which the constant jolting shook, she had risen to her feet and was clinging to the partition in a sudden spasm of agony. And under the pale, yellow, dancing gleam of the lamp she once more looked.

emaciated, with a livid, tortured face.

"Take care, madame, she will fall!" the priest called to Madame de Jonquière, who, with eyelids lowered, was at last giving way to sleep.

She made all haste to intervene, but Sister Hyacinthe had turned more quickly and eaught La Grivotte in her arms. frightful fit of coughing, however, prostrated the unhappy creature upon the seat, and for five minutes she continued stifling, shaken by such an attack that her poer body seemed to be actually eracking and rending. Then a red thread oozed from between her lips, and at last she spat up blood by the throatful.

"Good heavens! good heavens! it's coming on her again!" reated Madame de Jonquière in despair. "I had a fear of it; peated Madame de Jonquière in despair. I was not at ease, seeing her look so strange. Wait a moment; I will sit down beside her."

But the Sister would not consent: "No, no, madame, sleep a little. I'll watch over her. You are not accustomed to it; you would end by making yourself ill as well."

Then she settled herself beside La Grivotte, made her rest her head against her shoulder, and wiped the blood from her lips. The attack subsided, but weakness was coming back, so extreme that the wretched woman was scarcely able to stammer, "Oh, it is nothing, nothing at all; I am cured, I am cured, completely cured!"

Pierre was thoroughly upset. This sudden, overwhelming relapse had sent an icy chill through the whole earriage. Many of the passengers raised themselves up and looked at La Grivotte with terror in their eyes. Then they dived down into their corners again, and nobody spoke, nobody stirred any further. Pierre, for his part, reflected on the curious medical aspect of this girl's to prove to him the impossibility of his miracles any more than verification work, absolutely convinced that nobody would be able whilst Doctor Bonamy, full of serenity, quietly continued his science is still struggling, again appeared to Pierre. And he once more saw Doctor Chassaigne shrugging his shoulders with disdain sea of error, and ignorance, the darkness amidst which human Or was it some other malady, some unknown disease, quietly continuing its work in the midst of contradictory diagnoses? The this, then, some special ease of phthisis complicated by neurosis? returned to her with brutal force, victorious over everything. Was the heavy ashen face of one in the last agony. Her ailment had a dancing gait, her face quite radiant the while; and now she had spat blood, her cough had broken out afresh, she again had displayed a ravenous appetite, she had walked long distances with case. Her strength had come back to her over yonder. She had sisimud. weeks, three months, or three years' time, like La Grivotte's and arising from faulty mutrition of the skin, might be benefited by a great moral shock? At all events there here scemed to be a miracle, unless, indeed, the sore should reappear again in three weeks, these series indeed, the sore should reappear again in three weeks, three cases, indeed, the sore should reappear again in three weeks, three cases are supported to the property of admit that certain forms of lupus, as yet but imperfectly studied more. Was it even a real lupus? Might it not rather be some unknown form of ulcer of hysterical origin? Or ought one to teeling hornfied. The sea of incertifude stretched before him once so lately a monster's face, which one could now look at without sore, which was certainly healing, if not already healed—that face, subsided. And again did Pierre feel astonished at sight of that about her head, and then again peering into her glass to see if this headgear became her, now that the swelling of her lip had toilet, tying the black wrap which had served to hide her sore eyes. Elise Rouquet, who had a whole seat to licrself, was also getting ready to lie down, but first of all she made quite an elaborate mare like torpor, with big, silent tears still flowing from her elesed a pillow on which to rest her poor pain-racked head; and then, as docile as a child, quite stupefied, she fell asleep in a nightcompelled Madame Vincent to lie down on the seat, and gave her stretching himself out in order to sleep more constortably. Each of its occupants was making preparations, black night. deantime the carriage was rolling, rolling along, through the "I am cared, completely cared; they all told me so, over yonder.

"Ohl I am not frightened," La Grivotte continued, stammering, he himself could have proved their possibility.

numble of the wheels. asleep when they left Lamothe. Sister Hyacinthe, upon whose knees La Grivotte was now drowsily resting her head, was unable to rise, and, for form's sake, merely said, "Silence, silence, my children!" in a low voice, which died away amidst the growling children of the growling It was len o'clock, and the people in the carriage were falling

However, something continued stirring in an adjoining compartment; she heard a noise which irritated her nerves, and the eause of which she at last fancied she could understand.

"Why do you keep on kicking the seat, Sophie?" she asked.

"You must get to sleep, my child.

"I'm not kicking, Sister. It's a key that was rolling about under "A keyl-how is that? Pass it to me."

Then she examined it. A very old, poor-looking key it wasblackened, worn away, and polished by long use, its ring bearing the mark of where it had been broken and resoldered. However, they all searched their pockets, and none of them, it seemed, had losť a key.

"I found it in the corner," now resumed Sophie; "it must have belonged to the man.

"What man?" asked Sister Hyacinthe.

"The man who died there."

They had already forgotten him. But it had surely been his, for Sister Hyaeinthe recollected that she had heard something. fall while she was wiping his forehead. And she turned the key over and continued looking at it, as it lay in her hand, poor, ugly, wretched key that it was, no longer of any use, never again to open the lock it belonged to—some unknown lock, hidden far away in the depths of the world. For a moment she was minded to put it in her pocket, as though by a kind of compassion for this little bit of iron, so humble and so mysterious, since it was all that remained of that unknown man. But then the pious thought came to her that it is wrong to show attachment to any earthly thing; and, the window being half-lowered, she threw out the key, which fell into the black night.

"You must not play any more, Sophie," she resumed. "Come, come, my children, silence!"

It was only after the brief stay at Bordeaux, however, at about half-past eleven o'clock, that sleep came back again and overpowered all in the earriage. Madame de Jonquière had been unable to contend against it any longer, and her head was now resting against the partition, her face wearing an expression of happiness amidst all her fatigue. The Sabathiers were, in a like fashion, ealmly sleeping; and not a sound now came from the compartment which Sophie Couteau and Elise Rouquet occupied. stretched in front of each other, on the seats. From time to time a low plaint would rise, a strangled cry of grief or fright, escaping from the lips of Madame Vincent, who, amidst her prostration, was being tortured by evil dreams. Sister Hyncinthe was one of the very few who still had their eyes open, anxious as she was respecting La Grivotte, who now lay quite motionless, like a felled animal, breathing painfully, with a continuous wheezing sound. From one to the other end of this travelling dormitory, shaken by wise spread out before him. She, having penetrated his sad secret, had come to Lourdes to pray to Heaven for the miracle of his conversion. When they had remained alone under the trees amidst the perfume of the invisible roses, during the night procession, they had prayed one for the other, mingling one in the other, with an ardent desire for their mutual happiness. Before the Grotto, too, she, lind entreated the Blessed Virgin to forget her and to save him, if she could obtain but one tayour from her Divine Son: Then, healed, beside herself, transported with love and gatitude, whirled with her little car up the inclined ways to the Basiliea, she had thought her prayers granted, and had eried aloud the joy she felt that they should have both been saved, together, together! Ah! that lie which he, prompted by affection and charity, had told, that error in which he had from that moment suffered her to remain, with what a weight did it oppress his heart! It was the heavy slab which walled him in his voluntarily chosen sepulchre. He remembered the frightful attack of grief which had almost killed him in the gloom of the crypt, his sobs, his brutal revolt, his longing to keep her for himself alone, to possess her since he knew her to be his own-all that rising passion of his awakened manhood, which little by little had fallen asleep again, drowned by the rushing river of his tears; and in order that he might not destroy the divine illusion which possessed her, yielding to brotherly compassion, he had taken that heroic vow to lie to her, that vow which now filled him with such anguish.

Pierre shuddered amidst his reverie. Would he have the strength to keep that vow for ever? Had he not detected a feeling of impatience in his heart even whilst he was waiting for her at the railway station, a jealous longing to leave that Lourdes which she loved too well, in the vague hope that she might again become his own, somewhere far away? If he had not been a priest he would have married her. And what rapture, what felicity would then have been his! He would have given himself wholly unto her, she would have been wholly his own, and he and she would have lived again in the dear child that would doubtless have been born to them. All surely that alone was divine, the life which is complete, the life which creates life! And then his reveriestrayed: he pictured himself married, and the thought filled him with such delight that he asked why such a dream should be unrealisable? She knew no more than a child of ten; he would educate her, form her mind. She would then understand that this cure for which she thought herself indebted Blessed Virgin, had in reality come to her from the Only Mother, serene and impassive Nature. But even whilst he was thus settling things in his mind a kind of terror, horn of his religious education, arose within him. Could he tell if that human happiness with which he desired to endow her would ever be worth as much as the holy ignorance, the infantile candom poor heart. he became conscious of nothing beyond the sufferings of his there hay reason, life, real manhood, real womanhood. Why, then, did he not dare? Horrible sadness was breaking upon his reverie, her to consent to such sacrilege? Yet therein lay the brave course; healed by an alleged miracle-ravage her faith sufficiently to induce afterwards if she should not be happy. Then, too, what a drama it would all be; he to throw off the cassock, and marry this girl in which she now lived? How bitterly he would reproach himself then, Marie leant towards Pierre, and softly said to him: "It's strange, my friend; I am so sleepy, and yet I can't sleep." Then, with a light laugh, she added: "I've got Paris in my head!" awake amidst the weary slumber of the carriage, and, just The train was still tolling along with its great noise of stapping ngs. Beside Pierre and Marie, only Sister Hyacinthe was still

1

"sing-half, si wolf."

where I shall have to livel" about to return to it-that Paris which I know nothing of, and I'm thinking that it's waiting for me, that I am and, some day, meeting the husband who would finish her gay, neatthy young girl, running everywhere, looking and learning, ripen, now that it could by freely once more. He beheld her, a of a big girl of three-and-twenty, that soul which illness had kept again trom ochers, far from tifte, far even orthory, would soon little spotless soul which had remained so candid in the frame little being fatally acquiring all the education of woman. well forescen it; she could no longer belong to him, she would belong to others. If Lourdes had restored her to him, Paris was about to take her from him again. And he pictured this ignorant These words brought fresh anguish to Pierre's heart. He had in Paris to help her a little. She is so good, she works so hard. I don't wish that she should have to continu cannut all the to amuse ourselves?" she replied. "No. I was thinking of my poor sister Blanche, and wondering what I should be able to do "Ohl what are you saying, my friend? Are we rich enough to amuse ourselves?" she replied. "No. I was thinking of my education. "And so," said he, "you propose to amuse yourself in Paris?"

tomers?" a portrait of papa which was very like him, and which everybody praised. You will help me, won't you? You will find me customers?" miniatures rather nicely. You remember, don't you, that I painted "Formerly, before I suffered so dreadfully, I painted :pappe aus And; after a fresh pause, as he, deeply moved, remained silent. money."

She would buy it out of the first money she could save cretonne, something pretty, with a pattern of little blue flowers. She wanted to arrange her room and hang it with Then she began talking of the new life which she was about had spoken to her of the big shops where things could be bought so cheaply. To go out with Blanche and run about a little would be so amusing for her, who, confined to her bed since childhood, had never seen anything. Then Pierre, who for a moment had been calmer, again began to suffer, for he could divine all her glowing desire to live, her ardour to see everything, knew everything, and taste everything. It was at last the awakening of the woman whom she was destined to be, whom he had divined in childhood's days—a dear creature of gaicty and passion, with blooming lips, starry eyes, a milky complexion, golden hair, all resplendent with the joy of being.

"Oh! I shall work, I shall work," she resumed; "but you are right Pierre, I shall also amuse myself, because it cannot be a sin to be gay, can it?"

"No, surely not, Marie."

"On Sundays we will go into the country, old very far away into the woods where there are beautiful trees. And we will sometimes go to the theatre, too, if papa will take us. I have been told that there are many plays that one may see. But, after all, it's not all that. Provided I can go out and walk in the streets and see things, I shall be so happy; I shall come home so gay. It is so nice to live, is it not, Pierre?"

"Yes, yes, Marie, it is very nice."

A chill like that of death was coming over him; his regret that he was no longer a man was filling him with agony. But since she tempted him like this with her irritating candour, why should he not confess to her the truth which was ravaging his being? He would have won her, have conquered her. Never had a more frightful struggle arisen between his heart and his will. For a moment he was on the point of uttering irrevocable words.

But with the voice of a joyous child she was already resuming: "Oh! look at poor papa; how pleased he must be to sleep so soundly!"

On the seat in front of them M, de Guersaint was indeed slunbering, with a comfortable expression on his face, as though he were in his bed, and had no consciousness of the continous rolling of the train. This monotonous rolling and heaving seemed, in fact, a lullaby rocking the whole carriage to sleep. All surrendered themselves to it, sinking, powerless on to the piles of bags and parcels, many of which had also fallen; and the rhythmical growling of the wheels never ceased in the unknown darkness through which the train-was still rolling. Now and again, as they passed through a station or under a bridge, there would be a loud rush of wind, a tempest would suddenly sweep by; and then the lulling, growling sound would begin again, ever the same for hours together.

Marie gently took hold of Pierre's hands; he and she were so lost, so completely alone among all those prostrated beings, in the deep rumbling peacefulness of the train, flying across the black blue eyes. had again come back to her, easting a shadow over her large night. And sadness, the sadness which she had hitherto hidden,

"You will often come with us, my good Pierre, won't you?"

His heart was on his lips, he was making up his mind to speak. However, he once again restrained himself and stammered: "I am not always at liberty, Marie; a priest cannot go everywhere, He had started on feeling her little hand pressing his own. spe: asked.

She leant nearer, and in a lower voice resumed: "Listen, my good Pierre, I am fearfully sad. I may look pleased, but there is death Then it was she who spoke, who confessed the mortal secret which had been oppressing her heart ever since they had started. 'A priest?" she repeated. "Yes, yes, a priest. "bnetstand."

my soul. You did not tell me the truth yesterday."

He became quite scared, but did not at first understand her. mos Aur in

"I did not tell you the truth-About what?" he asked.

true, Pierre, you have not found your lost faith again." let me believe that you had been saved with me, and it was not Then, like a friend, a sister, she continued: "No, you moment of descending into the depths of another conscience than A kind of shame restrained her, and she again hesitated at the

I assure you, Marie. How can you have formed such a wicked tinately clung to the falsehood born of his fraternal charity. "But catastrophe that he forgot his torments, And, at first he obs-Good Lord she knew. For him this was desolation, such a

"sid of as sull thoy of sein rebellious soul. And I divined everything, I understood everything when I savy that you did not kneel as well, that prayer did not Abbé Judaine had knelt down to pray for the repose of that yonder, at the station, and that unhappy man had died. too deeply if you were to speak to me falsely again. "Ohl be quiet, my friend, for pity's sake, It would grieve me,

"No, no, you did not pray for the dead, you no longer believe, "But, really, I assure you, Marie-" eyes directly they meet mine. The Blessed Virgin did not grant my prayer, she did not restore your faith, and I am very, very wretehed." hide from me, a melancholy look which conies into your poor thing which comes to me from you, a despair which you can't And besides, there is something else; something I can guess, some-so very wretched." "Ahl Marie, I am very wretched also. Ohl. voice, he stammered: confessing, in his turn letting his tears flow, whilst, in a very low she was still holding. It quite upset him, and he ceased struggling, She was weeping, a hot tear fell upon the priest's hand, which feeling that the abyss which parts different beliefs was yawning between them. They would hever belong to one another again. and they were in despair at being so utterly unable to bring themselves nearer to one another; but the severance was henceforth definitive, since Heaven itself had been unable to reconnect the bond. And thus, side by side, they wept over their separation.

For a moment they remained silent, in their cruel grief at

"I who prayed so fervently for your conversion," she said in a dolorous voice, "I who was so happy. It had seemed to me that your soul was mingling with mine; and it was so delightful to have been saved-together, together. I felt such strength for life;

oh, strength enough to raise the world!"

He did not answer; his tears were still flowing, flowing without end.

"And to think," she resumed, "that I was saved all alone; that this great happiness fell upon me without you having any share in it. And to see you so forsaken, so desolate, when I am loaded with grace and joy, rends my heart. Ahl how severe the Blessed Virgin has been! Why did she not heal your soul at the same time as she healed my body?"

The last opportunity was presenting itself; he ought to have illumined this innocent creature's mind with the light of reason, have explained the miracle to her, in order that life, after accomplishing its healthful work in her body, might complete its triumph by throwing them into one another's arms. 'He also was healed, his mind was healthy now, and it was not for the loss of faith, but for the loss of herself, that he was weeping. However, invincible compassion was taking possession of him amidst all his grief. No, no, he would not trouble that dear soul; he would not rob her of her belief, which some day might prove her only stay amidst the sorrows of this world. One cannot yet require of children and women the bitter heroism of reason. He had not the strength to do it; he even thought that he had not the right. It would have seemed to him violation, abominable murder. And he did not speak out, but his tears flowed, hotter and hotter. in this immolation of his love, this despairing sacrifice of his own happiness in order that she might remain candid and ignorant and gay at heart.
"Oh, Marie! how wretched I-am! Nowhere on the roads nowhere at the galleys even, is there a man more wretched that myselfl Oh, Mariel if you only knew; if you only knew how wretched I am!"

. She was distracted, and caught him in her trembling arms wishing to console him with a sisterly embrace. 'And at that moment the woman awaking within her understood everything. and she herself sobbed with sorrow that both human and divine will should thus part them. She had never yet reflected on such things, but suddenly she caught a glimpse of life, with its passions, its struggles, and its sufferings; and then, seeking for hat she might say to soothe in some degree that broken heart, e stammered yery faintly, distressed that she could find nothing test snough "I know I know."

orkes of lights had appeared, possibly the lights of some distant vers, what hills one was crossing. A short time back some bright the train without one even being able to tell what forests, what fack country-side whose unknown depths went by on cittier side n and on through the darkness. And she likewise distrusted that zerce visible, which a tempest blast, a furious rush, was carrying iere, ill-defined bodies amidst nameless things, ghostly torms ther own compartment. And now there were only vague shadows eariness, had just closed her eyes, after drawing the lamp-screen ard, Even Sister Hyacinthe, giving way to the overpowering nes, had stured amidst the rough rocking which bore them onok of a big child. Not one of the pilgrims, not one of the alling Her tather was still sleeping, with the mnocent en than belore. e slumber which reigned in the carriage seemed more heavy the angets, she became anxious and looked around her. id as though that which she had to say ought only to be heard Then the words it was needful she should speak came to her; veet enough, "I know, I know--" vent, not knowing where they were. Then, with a chaste contusion, blushing amidst her tears, Marie placed her tips near Pierre's ear. "Listen, my friend; there is a great secret between the Blessed Virgin and myselt. I had sworn hat I would never tell it to anybody. But you are too unhappy, ou are suffering too bitterly; she will forgive me; I will confide t to you."

ver, the night again streamed deeply all round, the obscure, affinite, nameless sea, farther and tarther through which they ever

And in a faint breath she went on: "During that night of love, you know, that night of burning ecstasy which I spent before the Grotto, I engaged nyself by a-vow: I promised the Blessed Virgin the gift of my chastity if she would but heal me. . . She has izealed me, and never—you hear me, Pierre, never will I marry

Ahl what unhoped-for sweetness! He thought that a balmy dew was falling on his poor wounded heart. It was a diver the chantment, a delicious relief. If she belonged to none other the would always be a little bit his own. And how well she had known heis forment and what it was needful she should say as other the.

his forment and what it was needful she should set in order teelific might yet be possible for him.

In his turn he wished to find happy words and pract with also would ever be hers, ever lowe her as he had loved tax taxes.

also would ever be hers, ever love her as he had loved her executioned, like the dear creature she was, whose one is the long ago, had sufficed to perfume his entire like. But the execution him stop, already anxious, fearing to spoil that pive many on, in triend, she mummed, 'let us say noting now...

be wrong, perhaps. I am very weary; I shall sleep quietly now."
And, with her head against his shoulder, she fell asleep at once, like a sister who is all confidence. He for a moment kept himself awake in that painful happiness of renunciation which they had just tasted together. It was all over, quite over now; the sacrifice was consummated. He would live a solitary life, apart from the life of other men. Never would he know woman, never would any child be born to him. And there remained to him only the consoling pride of that accepted and desired suicide, with the desolate grandeur that attaches to lives which are beyond the pale of nature.

. But fatigue overpowered him also; his eyes closed, and in his turn he fell asleep. And afterwards his head slipped down, and his cheek tonched the cheek of his dear friend, who was sleeping very gently with her brow against his shoulder. Then their hair mingled. She had her golden hair, her royal hair, half unbound and it streamed over his face, and he dreamed amidst its perfume Doubtless the same blissful dream fell upon them both, for their loving faces assumed the same expression of rapture; they both seemed to be smiling to the angels. It was chaste and passionate abandon, the innocence of chance slumber placing them: in one another's arms, with warm, close lips so that their breath mingled like the breath of two babes lying in the same cradle. And such was their bridal night, the consumnation of the spiritual marriage in which they were to live, a delicious annihilation born of extreme fatigue; with scarcely a fleeting dream of mystical possession, amidst this carriage of wretehedness and suffering, which still and ever rolled along through the dense night. Hours and hours slipped by, the wheels growled, the bags and baskets swung from the brass hooks, whilst from the piled-up, crushed bodies there only arose a sense of terrible fatigue, the great physical exhaustion brought back from the land of miraeles when the overworked souls returned home.

At last, at five o'clock, whilst the sun was rising, there was a sudden awakening, a resounding entry into a large station, with porters calling, doors opening, and people serambling together. They were at Poitiers, and at once the whole earriage was on foot, amidst a chorus of laughter and exclamations.

Little Sophie Couteau alighted here, and was bidding everybody farewell. She embraced all the ladies, even passing over the partition to take leave of Sister Claire des Anges, whom nobody had seen since the previous evening, for, silent and slight of build, with eyes full of mystery, she had vanished into her corner. Then the child came back again, took her little parcel, and showed herself particularly amiable towards Sister Hyacinthe and Madame de Jonquière.

"Au revoir, Sister! Au revoir, madame! I thank you for all your kindness."

"You must come back again next year, my child."

However, the world still flocked around her, the persecution of the multitude began afresh. She was pursued even into the cloister through an irresistible desire to obtain favours from her saintly person. Ahl to see her, touch her, become lucky by gazing on her or surreptitiously rubbing some medal against her dress. It was the eredulous passion of fetishism, a rush of believers pursuing this poor beatified being in the desire which each felt to seeure a share of hope and divine illusion. She wept at it with very weariness. with impatient revolt, and often repeated: "Why do they torment me like this? What more is there in me than in others?" at last she felt real grief at thus becoming "the raree-show," as she ended by terming herself with a sad, suffering smile. defended herself as far as she could, refusing to see any one. Her companions defended her also, and sometimes very sternly, showing her only to such visitors as were authorised by the Bishop. The doors of the convent remained closed, and ecclesiasties almost alone succeeded in effecting an entrance. Still, even this was too much for her desire for solitude, and she often had to be obstinate, to request that the priests who had called might be sent away, weary as she was of always telling the same story, of ever answering the same questions. She was incensed, wounded, on behalf of the Blessed Virgin herself. Still, she sometimes had to yield, for the Bishop in person would bring great personages. dignitaries, and prelates; and she would then appear with her. grave air, answering politely and as briefly as possible; only feeling at ease when she was allowed to return to her shadowy corner. Never, indeed, had distinction weighed more heavily on a mortal. One day, when she was asked it she was not proof of the visits paid her by the Bishop, she answered simply: "Monseigneur he comes to show me." On another One day, when she was asked if she was not proud of the continual occasion some princes of the Church, great militant Catholies, who wished to see her, were overcome with emotion and sobbed before her; but, in her horror of being shown, in the vexation they caused her simple mind, she left them without comprehending, merely feeling very weary and very sad.

At length, however, she grew accustomed to Saint-Gildard, and spent a peaceful existence there, engaged in avocations of which she became very fond. She was so delicate, so frequently ill, that she was employed in the infirmary. In addition to the little assistance she rendered there, she worked with her needle, with which she became rather skilful, embroidering albs and altar-cloths in a delicate manner. But at times she would lose all strength; and be unable to do even the light work. When she was not confined to her bed she spent long days in an easy-chair, her only diversion being to recite her rosary or to read some pious work. Now that she had learnt to read, books interested her, especially the beautiful stories of conversion, the delightful legends in which saints of both sexes appear, and the splendid and terrible dramas in which

When Bernadette was well, and able to perform her duties in: pooq. Calvary which she also had been ascending ever since her childthere was the unconscious dolour of her own passion, the desolate suffering body quiver for hours. Mingled with her tears, perhaps, bened only the day before. She sobbed with pity; it made her poor as though it were some extraordinary tragical event that had hapincreasing delight. The story of the Passion particularly upset her, book herself, she found in it a constant source of surprise, an everpassage at which the perusal had ceased, And now that she read the continued repeating the narrative by heart, whatever might be the already known those beautiful stories so well that she could have the top of the right-hand page; and even at that time she had the leaves to open the book at random, and then read aloud from ed yellow; she could again see her foster-father slip a pin between had been in the family a hundred years, and whose pages had turnwonderful New Testament of whose perpetual miracle she never wearied. She remembered the Bible at Bartres, that old book which the book at which she continually marvelled, was the Bible, that the devil is bailled and east back into hell, But her great favourite, poor unknown little girl as in the far-away days of Barteds! Later cried the least, so hanny was she at once more feeling herself a to our oda and to was not show the was not show the officers of tound her neck, and the garden would then fill with the noise all ran to her, jumped upon her lap, and passed their tiny arms love her as though they recognised in lier one of themselves. They lity And this-gift of childishness which she had retained the simple innocence of the child she still was, also made children distinct features, a decided nersonality, charming even in its puericompassionate. In fact, no nun was ever so much a woman, with bigoted or over-exacting with regard to others, but tolerant and devotion, although she spent days in prayer, she was not at all quite her own, which made her beloved. In spite of her great quick at repartee, full of mirth-provoking remarks, with a grace little daughter of Providence she was! She became lively, alert, beg pardon of everyone. But, more frequently, what a good She would humble herself, think herself damned, and remorse. rough; little imperfections which after each attack filled her with what sour-tempered and violent, cross-grained, anxious, and at times As she grew older and her sufferings increased she became somedivine brightness of her eyes, the beautiful eyes of a visionary, in which, as in a limpid sky, you detected the flight of her dreams. hollow, and lost its bloom of youth; but she retained the pure, the smallest Sister of the community, so that her companions atbeing, fond of laughing, roniping, and play. She was very little, the infirmary, she bustled about, filling the building with her child-ish liveliness. Until her death she remained an innocent infantile on it was related that a mother had one day brought her paralysed child to the convent for the saint to touch and cure it. The woman sobbed so much that the Superior ended by consenting to make the attempt. However, as Bernadette indignantly protested whenever she was asked to perform a miracle, she was not forewarned, but simply called to take the sick child to the infirmary. And she did so, and when she stood the child on the ground it walked. It was cured.

Ahl how many times must Bartrès and her free childhood spent watching her lambs—the years passed among the hills, in the long grass, in the leafy woods—have returned to her during the hours she gave to her dreams when weary of praying for sinners! No one then fathomed her soul, no one could say if involuntary regrets did not rend her wounded heart. One day she spoke some words, which her historians have preserved, with the view of making her passion more touching. Cloistered far away from her mountains, confined to a bed of siekness, she exclaimed: "It seems to me that I was made to live, to act, to be ever on the move, and yet the Lord will have me remain motionless." What a revelation, full of a terrible testimony and immense sadness! Why should the Lord wish that dear being, all grace and gaiety, to remain motionless? Could she not have honoured Him equally well by living the free, healthy life that she had been born to live? And would she not have done more to increase the world's happiness and her own if, instead of praying for sinners, her constant occupation, she had given her love to the husband who might have been wedded to her and the children who might have been born to her? She, so gay and so active, would, on certain evenings, become extremely depressed. She turned gloomy and remained wrapped in herself, as though overcome by excess of pain. No doubt the cup was becoming too bitter. The thought of her life's perpetual renunciation was killing her.

Did Bernadette often think of Lourdes whilst she was at Saint-Gildard? What knew she of the triumph of the Grotto, of the prodigies which were daily transforming that land of miraeles? These questions were never thoroughly elucidated. Her companions were forbidden to talk to her of such matters, which remained enveloped in absolute, continual silence. She herself did not care to speak of them: she kept silent with regard to the mysterious past, and evinced no desire to know the present, however triumphant it might be. But all the same did not her heart, in imagination, fly away to the enchanted country of her childhood, where lived her kith and kin, where all her life-ties had been formed, where she had left the most extraordinary dream that ever luman being dreamt? Surely she must have sometimes travelled the beautiful journey of memory, she must have known the main features of the great events that had taken place at Lourdes. What she most dreaded was to go there herself, and she always refused should like to, were I a little birdl". thither asked her with a smile, "Will you come with us?" she shivered slightly, and then hastily replied, "No, nol but how I of her element, bewildered, ashamed. And so, when pilgrims bound She would have suffered too much there, she would have been out no longer her land, that place of crowds, of violence and trafficking. her recoil with affright had she understood it. No, not that was she had put in motion, and the working of which would have made easy, for they knew her, so gentle and so humble in her fear of becoming divine, in her ignorance of the colossal machine which her from the world for her salvation's sake. In reality they were elect, a friend of the Blessed Virgin. But the Fathers never really feared this, although express orders had been given to withdraw a female pope, with the infallibility and sovereignty of one of the her visions, have worked miracles there, have become a priestess, tious, domineering! She would have returned to the holy spot of What glory would have been hers had she been headstrong, ambiand fearful of meeting the crowds whose adoration awaited her. to do so, knowing full well that she could not remain unrecognised, eglantine, as on the days when the Gave was not walled in by a wild primitive Crotto that she returned to kneel, amongst the bushy when no one could there disturb its devotions. It was before the lonesome flight to Lourdes on days of solitude, in the peaceful hours her mysterious journeys; the little bird of her soul only winged its torgot her. It was never the re-echoing solemnities that prompted gloom of the cloister, where the opulent farmers of the Crotto nuous hosanna, and she only tasted joy in forgetfulness, in the of her glory; her work shone forth resplendently amidst a contidesire and anxiety. And when the priest exclaimed, "Ahl it you had only seen that pompl" she answered: "Mel I was much better here in my little corner in the infirmary. They had robbed her Whilst listening she trembled with her customary little quiver of in golden vestments who had assembled in the resplendent Basilica. sand pilgrims who had flocked to it, and the five-and-thirty bishops never-to-be-forgotten wonders of the ceremony, the hundred thouto pray for her before the Grotto came back and told her of the year of the crowning of the Virgin, a priest whom she had deputed Lourdes, as though that rising town were no longer her own. The resigned, and she did not ask him a single question about New admission to the convent, However, he found her weary and brother, who, coming to Nevers to complain, had been refused had remained poor, and she had insisted on seeing her eldest her kin; she was anxious to procure work for her relations who there for ciries her fathers or her mothers tuneral. Yet, she loved fight and noiseless wings, which continually went on pilgrimage to the Crotto, In her dreams, indeed, she must have continually Her reverie alone was that little travelling bird, with rapid monumental quay. And it was the old town that she visited at twilight, when the cool perfumed breezes came down from the mountains, the old painted and gilded semi-Spanish Church where she had made her first communion, the old Asylum so full of suffering where during eight years she had grown accustomed to solitude -all that poor innocent old town, whose every paving-stone awoke old affections in her memory's depths.

And did Bernadette ever extend the pilgrimage of her dreams as far as Bartrès? Probably, at times when she sat in her invalidchair and let some pious book slip from her tired hands, and closed her eyes, Bartrès did appear to her, lighting up the darkness of her view. The little antique Romanesque Church with sky-blue nave and blood-red altar screens stood there amidst the tombs of the narrow cemetery. Then she would find herself once more in the house of the Lagûes, in the large room on the left, where the fire was burning, and where, in winter-time, such wonderful stories were told whilst the big clock gravely ticked the hours away. times the whole country-side spread out before her, meadows without end, giant ehestnut-trees beneath which you lost yourself, deserted table-lands whence you described the distant mountains. the Pie du Midi and the Pie de Viscos soaring aloft as airy and as rose-eoloured as dreams, in a paradise such as the legends have depicted. And afterwards, afterwards came her free ehildhood, when she scampered off whither she listed in the open air, her lonely dreamy thirteenth year, when with all the joy of living she, wandered through the immensity of nature. And now, too, perhaps she again beheld herself roaming in the tall grass among the hawthorn bushes beside the streams on a warm sunny day in June. Did she not picture herself grown, with a lover of her own age, / whom she would have loved with all the simplicity and affection of her heart? Ahl to be a child again, to be free, unknown, happy once more, to love atresh, and to love differently! The vision must have passed confusedly before her-a husband who worshipped her, children gaily growing up around her, the life that everybody led, the joys and sorrows that her own parents had known, and which her children would have had to know in their turn. But little by little all vanished, and she again found herself in her chair of suffering, imprisoned between four cold walls, with no other desire than a longing one for a speedy death, since she had been denied a share of the poor common happiness of this world.

Bernadette's ailments increased each year. It was, in fact, the commencement of her passion, the passion of this new child-Messiah, who had come to bring relief to the unhappy, to announce. to mankind the religion of divine justice and couality in the face of miraeles which flouted the laws of impassible nature. If she now rose it was only to drag herself from chair to chair for a few days at a time, and then she would have a relapse and he again forced to take to her bed. Her sufferings became terrible. Her bemard took the final vows on September 22, 1878. Twenty years In the midst of her frightful sufferings, however, Sister Marieascends but one desperate longing for health and happiness? glorification of suffering, when from the whole of humanity there end? Where is the reason in this uscless equelty, in this revolting to suffer, O Lord! but why, and to what unknown and senseless mghtiul words, words pregnant with a blacker pessimism. Happy with them immediately. "Ohl how I suffer, ohl how I suffer! but what happiness it is to bear this paint." There can be no more who died to give others life. When her hones ached with agony she would sometimes utter complaints, but she reproached herself longer agony fell to her, who again brought redeniption by pain, against His mouth, streaming the while with blood like Him, and steeped like Him in bitterness! Jesus died in three days, but a unite herself to Jesus, her limbs against His limbs, her mouth herself against the disease which made her groan, and she crucified herself in thought, extending her arms so as to form a cross and miss herself in thought, extending her arms revolt which maddened her at times, and wished also to strengthen which Thou hast endoyved their flesh? She dreaded the feeling of Nature which Thou hast created, nor the human affections with that Thy creatures should enjoy neither the sun, nor the smiling indispensable, enviable, and blessed. But is this not blasphemous, O Lord? Hast Thou not created youth and joy? Is it Thy wish. suffer upon earth if one would triumph elsewhere, that suffering is was ever the idea that suffering is the test, that it is necessary to "Heaven is at the end, but how long the end is in coming!" There should be necessary for this poor being to be tortured! She sob-bed, and again and again said in order to keep up her courage: selection! How absurd that in the eternal evolution of worlds it dost. Thou not save the souls of the others? What an inexplicable King, why cure others and not cure her? To save her soul? Then possible to suffer more, or with greater fortifiede. She tried some of the Lourdes water, but it brought her no relief. Lord, Almighty pitied her; those who beheld her martyrdom said that it was uneach fit rending her burning cheet and leaving her half dead.

To complete her misery, earies of the right knee-eap supervened, a gnaving disease, the shooting pains of which cansed her to cry aloud. Her poor body, to which dressings were to cry aloud. Her poor body, to which dressings were tention being applied, became one great sore, which was irritated by the warmfh of her bed, by her prolonged sojourn between taked by the warmfh of her bed, by her prolonged sojourn between taked by the warmfh of her bed, by her prolonged sojourn between taked by the warmfh of her bed, by her prolonged sojourn between these warmfh of her head by the warmfh of her bed, by her prolonged sojourn between sheets whose friction ended by breaking her shap in was implied her those who beheld her martvudom said that it was implied her; those who beheld her martvudom said that it was implied her; those who beheld her martvudom said that it was implied her; those who beheld her martvudom said that it was implied. hereditary nervousness, her asthma, aggravated by cloister life, had probably turned into phthisis. She conghed frightfully, had gone by since the Blessed Virgin had appeared to her, visiting her, as the Angel had visited the Virgin, choosing her most Virgin had been chosen, amongst the most lowly and the most candid, that she might hide within her the secret of King Jesus, sandid, that she mystical explanation of that election of suffering, the raison d'être of that being who was so harshly separated from her fellows, weighed down by disease, transformed into the pitiable field of every human affliction. She was the "garden inclosed" that brings such pleasure to the gaze of the Spouse. He had chosen her, then buried her in the death of her hidden life. And even when the unhappy creature staggered beneath the weight of her cross her companions would say to her: "Do you forget that the Blessed Virgin promised you that you should be happy, not in this world, but in the next?" And with renewed strength, and striking her forehead, she would answer: "Forget? no, no! it is here!" She only recovered temporary energy by means of this illusion of a paradise of glory, into which she would enter escorted by scraphims, to be for ever and ever happy. The three personal secrets which the Blessed Virgin had confided to her, to arm her against evil, must have been promises of beauty, felicity, and immortality in heaven. What monstrous dupery if there were only the darkness of the earth beyond the grave, if the Blessed Virgin of her dream were not there to meet her with the prodigious guerdons she had promised! But Bernadette had not a doubt; she willingly undertook all the little commissions with which her companions naïvely entrusted her for Heaven: "Sister Marie-Bernard, you'll say this ony brother if you meet him in Paradise. Sister Marie-Bernard, give me a little place beside you when I die." And red each one: "Have no fear, I will do it!" Ahl delicious repose, power ever rejuvenated and

consolatory!

And then came the last agony, then came death. On Friday, March 28, 1879, it was thought that she would not last the night. She had a despairing longing for the tomb, in order that she might suffer no more, and live again in heaven. And thus she obstinately refused to receive extreme unction, saying that twice already it had cured her. She wished, in short, that God would let her die, for it was more than she could bear, it would have been unreasonable to require that she should suffer longer. Yet she ended by consenting to receive the sacraments, and her last agony was thereby prolonged for nearly three weeks. The priest who acrifice of your life;" and one day, quite out of patience, she harply answered him: "But, Father, it is no sacrifice." A terrible aying, that also, for it implied disgust at being, furious contempt or existence, and an immediate ending of her humanity, had she ad the power to suppress herself by a gesture. It is true that he poor girl had nothing to regret, that she had been compelled to anish everything from her life—health, joy, and love—so that she light leavo it as one easts off a soiled, worn, tattered garment.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Song of Solomon, IV 12.

And she was right; she condemned her useless, cruel life when she said: "My passion, will finish only at my death; it will not she said: "My passion, will finish only at my death; it will not cease until I enter into eternity." And this idea of her passion pursued her, attaching her more closely to the cross with her she pressed it vehemently against her poor maidenly breast, exclaiming that she would like to thrust it into her bosons and leave it there. Towards the end her strength completely forsook her, and she could no longer grasp the crueifx with her trembling hands. "Let it be tightly tied to me, she prayed, "that I may feel hands, "Let it be tightly tied to me, she prayed, "that I may feel only source that she was destined to know; His bleeding lists was not be the only one bestowed upon her womanhood, diverted from anture's course. The nuns took cords, passed them under her aching back, and fastened the erucifix so roughly to her bosom that it did indeed penetrate it.

germs which transmit love throughout the whole wast world. was sweet with the scent of flowers, laden with all the floating And she drove the sunshine from the room and the free air that "Be off, be off, Satanl let me die without fulfilling Nature's law." womanhood, whose true greatness consists in perpetuating life? an insult to Nature, the condemnation of life, the denial of the Church to woman, both wife and mother. To deeree that woman is only worthy of worship on condition that she be a virgin, to imagine this virgin to be herself born without sin, is not this to imagine this virgin to be herself born without sin, is not this to insult to the shear the same than tion, which her dream had come to strengthen, was a blow dealt by life when she reserved to the Celestial Bridegroom her tortured, crueisted womanhood. That dogma of the Immaculate Concepdread of life, which is the devil. It was life which menaced her, and it was life which she cast out, in the same way as she denied mained in her body it was necessary to leave her the hatred and -fuluess of her chaste soul? But doubtless so long as breath reand innocence? Could she not fall asleep serenely in the peacelast, why this nightmare-like ending, this death troubled by such frightful fancies, after so beautiful a life of candour, purity, again, I ask it, why this relendess suffering, intense to the very in a life so pure, in a soul without sinl what for, O Lordl and the flend had sought to throw himself upon her, that she had felt' his mouth scorching her with all the flames of hell. The devil around her. "Be off, be off, Satan!" she gasped; "do not touch me, do not carry me away!" And amidst her delirium she related that she trembled with fright, she beheld the devil jeering and provling At last death took pity upon her. On Easter Monday she was seized with a great fit of shivering. Hallucinations perturbed her,

On the Wednesday after Easter (April 16) the death agony commenced. It is related that on the morning of that day one of Bernadette's companions, a nun attacked with a mortal illness and lying in the infirmary in an adjoining bed, was suddenly healed upon drinking a glass of Lourdes water. But she, the privileged one, had drunk of it in vain. God at last granted her the signal favour which she desired by sending her into the good sound sleep of the earth, in which there is no more suffering. She asked pardon of everyone. Her passion was consummated; like the Saviour, she had the nails and the crown of thorns, the seourged limbs, the pierced side. Like Him she raised her eyes to heaven, extended her arms in the form of a cross, and attered a loud cry: "My God!" And, like Him, she said, towards three o'clock: "I thirst." She moistened her lips in the glass, then bowed her head, and expired.

Thus died, very glorious and very holy; the Visionary of Lourdes, Bernadette Soubirous, Sister Marie-Bernard, one of the Sisters of Charity of Nevers. During three days her body remained exposed to view, and vast crowds passed before it; a whole people hastened to the convent, an interminable procession of devotees hungering after hope, who rubbed medals, chaplets, pictures, and missals against the dead woman's dress, to obtain from her one more favour, a fetish bringing happiness. Even in death her dream of solitude was denied her: a mob of the wretched ones of this world rushed to the spot, drinking in illusion around her coffin. And it was noticed that her left eye, the eye which at the time of the apparitions had been nearest to the Blessed Virgin, remained obstinately open. Then a last miracle amazed the convent: the body underwent no change, but was interred on the third day, still supple, warm, with red lips, and a very white skin, rejuvenated as it were, and smelling sweet. And to-day Bernadette Soubirous, exiled from Lourdes, obscurely sleeps her last sleep at Saint-Gildard, beneath a stone slab in a little chapel, amidst the shade and silence of the old trees of the garden, whilst youder the Grotto shines resplendently in all its triumph."

Pierre eeased speaking; the beautiful, marvellous story was ended. And yet the whole carriage was still listening, deeply impressed by that death, at once so tregie and so touching. Compassionate tears fell from Marie's eyes, while the others, Elise Rouquet, La Grivotte herself, now calmer, clasped their hands and prayed to her who was in heaven to intercede with the Divinity to complete their cure. M. Sabathier made a big sign of the eross, and then ate a cake which his wife had bought him at Poitiers. M. de Guersaint, whom sad things always unset, had fallen asleep again in the middle of the story. And there was only Madame Vincent, with her face buried in her pillow, who had not stirred, like a deaf and blind creature, determined to see and hear nothing more.

Meanwhile the train rolled, still rolled along. Madame de Jon quière, after putting her head out of the window, informed them, that they were approaching Etampes. And, when they had left that station behind them, Sister Hyacinthe gave the signal, and they recited the third chaplet of the Rosary, the Five Clorious Mysteries—the Resurrection of Our Lord, the Assumption of the Most Lord, the Mission of the Holy Chost, the Assumption of the Most Blessed Virgin. And afterwards they sang the canticle:

"O Virgin, in thy help I put my trust."

ful fraternal feeling for all their ailments. He could not think of with them, and felt within himself, like an open wound, a sorrowimploring God to take pity on their suffering; and he had wept seen thousands of unhappy beings praying, weeping, and seen. He recalled the words of worthy Abbé Judaine; and he had with pity; his poor heart was returning wrung by all that he had inmense feeling of compassion. Ahl his heart was overflowing And of his journey there already only remained to Pierre an the impossible, to rush, perhaps, towards great moral catastrophes. attempt to bring that to pass would mean to dash oneself against twelfth century, would the entire nation kneel like a docile flock in the hands of the Master. To blindly, obstinately cling to the Never again, as in the cathedrals of the ciew was strugging. extreme agony in which belief under the antique form of Catholiaccident, whose reactionary violence was even a proof of the It was decisive; Lourdes was only an explainable vests for the men of to-day to become once more like the men of too much changed, too many new inspirations have sown new harretraces its stegs, humanity cannot return to childhood, times have out revolt or examination, was fatally doomed to fail. History never were no longer with them; this attempt to bring about the resurrection of absolute faith, the faith of dead-and-gone centuries, withthousands of pilgrims might each year go to Lourdes, the nations itself upon his mind like a brutal fact: the simple faith of the child who kneels and prays, the primitive faith of young people, bowed down by an awe born of their ignorance, was dead. Though puy again. never believe bluow he himself had dreamed through the continual torments of her flesh, and And now he had settled the point-Bernadette thin his taith. it grace would not come back to him in a lightning flash, restoring attempted with so much passion, were over! He had wished to acquire certainty, to study Bernadette's case on the spot, and see at Paris. So the great journey was finished! the inquiry which he had so much desired to make, the experiment which he had then, in an hour and a half at the utmost, they would at last be been acquainted. They still had to pass Bretigny and Juvisy, and norizon of this vast suburban expanse with which he had once him dizzy, and he ended by no longer recognising the familiar seemed to lull his thoughts. The noise of the wheels was making towards the now sunlit landscape, the continual flight of which Then Pierre fell into a deep reverie. His glance had turned those poor people without burning with a desire to relieve them. If the faith of the simple-minded no longer sufficed; if one rain the risk of going astray in wishing to turn back, would it become necessary to close the Grotto and preach other efforts, other sufferings? However, his compassion revolted at that thought. No, no! it would be a crime to snateh their dream of Heaven from those poor creatures who suffered either in body or in mind, and who only found relief in kneeling yonder amidst the splendour of tapers and the soothing repetition of hymns. He had not taken the murderous course of undeceiving Marie, but had sacrificed himself in order to leave her the joy of her fancy, the divine consolation of having been healed by the Virgin. Where was the man hard enough, cruel enough, to prevent the lowly from believing, to rob . them of the consplation of the supernatural, the hope that God troubled Himself about them, that He held a better life in His paradise in reserve for them? All humanity was weeping, desperate with anguish, like some despairing invalid, irrevocably condemned, and whom only a miraele could save. He felt mankind to be unhappy indeed, and he shuddered with fraternal affection in the presence of such pitiable humility, ignorance, poverty in its rags, disease with its sores and evil odour, all the lowly sufferers, in hospital, convent, and slums, amidst vermin and dut, with ugliness and imbecility written on their faces, an immense protest against health, life, and Nature, in the triumphal name of justice. equality, and benevolence. No, not it would never do to drive the wretched to despair. Lourdes must be tolerated, in the same way that you tolerate a falsehood which makes life possible. And, as he had already said in Bernadette's chamber, she remained the martyr, she it was who revealed to him the only religion which still filled his heart, the religion of human suffering. Ah! to be good and kindly, to alleviate all ills, to lull pain, to sleep in a dream, to lie even so that no one might suffer any more!

The train passed at full speed through a village, and Pierre vaguely caught sight of a church nestling amidst some large appletrees. All the pilgrims in the carriage crossed themselves. But he was now becoming uneasy, scruples were tinging his reverie with anxiety. This religion of human suffering, this redemption by pain, was not this yet another lure, a continual aggravation of pain and misery? It is cowardly and dangerous to allow superstition to live. To tolerate it and accept it is to revive the dark evil ages afresh. It weakens and stupefies; the sanctimoniousness bequeathed by heredity produces humility, timorous generations, decadent and docile nations, who are an easy prey to the powerful of the earth. Whole peoples are imposed upon, robbed, devoured, when they have devoted the whole effort of their will to the mere quest of a future existence. Would it not therefore, be better ldly eure humanity at once by closing the miraculous Grottos it goes to weep, and thus restore to it the courage to live absurd and the deposition of commonsense. Ahl reason, it was It was reason, protesting against the glorification of the Then a great brightness arose in Pierre's mind and dazzled man, and especially in the child. effort and the courage of truth should have been developed in Therein evidently lay peril and unreasonableness; at the risk even of losing illusion, the divine comforter, only the habit of personal for prodigies, this anxiety to drive the Divinity to transgress the And, in another respect, what a strange thing was this mad desire resigned yourself to the caprices of an unknown almighty power? use could it be to will anything, do anything, when you totally of one's energies? It benumbed the will, one's very being became dissolved in it and acquired disgust for life and action. Of what and softened: was it not after all but puerile jullaby, a debasement Lourdes, the endless supplication in which he had been immersed with prayer, that incessant flood of prayer which ascended from the real life, even in the midst of tears? And it was the same take. Pity was but a convenient expedient. One must live, one must it was sufficient to weep and love, he had made a dangerous mistears, softened by the sight of so much affliction, he had said that obstacle, enjoining the necessity of ignorance and folly. Reason before all, in her alone lay salvation. If at Lourdes, whilst bathed in suffering the hallowed suffering of the poor, ought not to prove an would not renounce and would not master. No, no, even human the sacrifice of his reason had become an impossibility; this he heredity had now definitely gained the upper hand, for henceforth strength enough to master his flesh, but he felt that his paternal and his mother, all faith, he, a priest, found it possible to ravage the discovery of the unknown, the slow victory of reason annidst all the wretchedness of body and mind. In the clashing of the twofold heredity which he had derived from his father, all brain and his mother all faith here. that there could be no healthy ideal outside the march towards is certainly a natural explanation which escapes me." He repeated he could not understand, it was she who whispered to him, "There mistress, and she it was who buoyed him up even amidst the obscurities and failures of science. Whenever he met with a thing which and humiliate and annihilate himself. Reason remained his sovereign like his old friend-that striken old man, who was afflicted with such dolorous senility, who had fallen into second childhood since the shipwreck of his affections-he had been unable to kill reason throughout entire Lourdes, had prevented him from believing. Unstood it, whose continual revolt at the grotto, at the Basilica, ing was to satisfy reason ever more and more, although it might cost him happiness to do so. It was reason, he now well underhappy. As he had told Doctor Chassaigne, his one consuming long-his life in order that he might keep his yows,

He had acquired act; reason must combat suffering, unless it be desired that the latter should last for ever.

However, as the train rolled on and the landscape flew by, a church once more appeared, this time on the fringe of heaven, some votive chapel perched upon a hill and surmounted by a lofty statuc of the Virgin. And once more all the pilgrims made the sign of the cross, and once more Pierre's reverie strayed, a fresh stream of reflections bringing his anguish back to him. What was this imperious need of the things beyond which tortured suffering humanity? Whence came it? Why should equality and justice be desired when they did not seem to exist in impassive nature? Man had set them in the unknown spheres of the Mysterious, in the supernatural realms of religious paradises, and there contented his ardent thirst. That unquenchable thirst for happiness had ever consumed him, and would consume him always. If the fathers of the Grotto drove such a glorious trade, it was simply because they made money out of what was divine. That thirst for the Divine, which nothing had quenched through the long, long ages, seemed to have returned with increased violence at the close of our century of science. Lourdes was a resounding and underiable proof that man could never live without the dream of a Sovereign Divinity, re-establishing equality and recreating happiness by dint of miracles. When man has descended to the depths of life's misfortunes. he returns to the divine illusion, and the origin of all religions lies there. Man, weak and bare, lacks the strength to live his terrestrial misery without the everlasting lie of a paradise. To-day, thought Pierre, the experiment had been made; it seemed that science alone could not suffice, and that one would be obliged to leave a door open on the Mysterious.

All at once in the depths of his deeply absorbed mind the words rang out, A new religion! The door which must be left open on the Mysterious was indeed a new religion. To subject mankind to brutal amputation, lop off its dream, and forcibly deprive it of the Marvellous, which it needed to live as much as it needed bread, would possibly kill it. Would it ever have the philosophical courage to take life as it is, and live it for its own sake without any idea of future rewards and penalties? It ecrtainly seemed that centuries must elapse before the advent of a society wise enough to lead a life of rectitude without the moral control of some cultus and the consolation of superhuman equality and justice. Yes, a new religion! The eall burst forth, resonnded within Pierre's brain like the eall of the nations, the eager, despairing desire of the modern soul. The consolation and hope which Catholicism had brought the world seemed exhausted after hydrogeneous agreement of the material series of the modern soul. It was an illusion departant it was at least necessary that the illusion should be added for refuge into the Christian paradise, it was because that paradise then opened before it like a fresh hope. But now a new religion, a new hope, a new paradise, yes, that was what the world thirsted for, in the discomfort in which it was struggling. And Father Fourcade, for his part, fully felt such to be the case; to his anxiety, entreating that the people of the great towns, the dense mass of the humble which forms the nation, might be brought to Lourdes. One hundred thousand, two hundred thousand pilgrims at Lourdes each year, that was, after all, but a grain of sand. It was the people, the whole people, that was required, But the people has forever deserted the churches, it required, But the people has forever deserted the churches, it wo longer puts any soul in the Blessed Virgins which it manufaction of such nothing nowadays could restore its lost faith. A Cathonic longer puts any soul in the Blessed Virgins which it manufactines, and nothing nowadays could restore its lost faith. A Cathonic connective, the world then begin afresh; only were it hoses nothing nowadays could restore its lost faith. A Cathonical been needed for such a task?

However, the words still sounded, still rang out in Pierre's mind with the growing clammy of pealing bells. A new religion, a larger place to the things of the a religion nearer to life, giving a larger place to the things of the world, and taking the acquired a larger place to the things of the world, and taking the acquired a larger place to the things of the world, and taking the sequired the people in the propulation and the sequired as larger place to the things of the world, and taking the sequired as larger place to the things of the scoular and a sould be a religion and the sequired as larger place to the things of the scoular and all all the a religion are set to life a religion and a sould and a sould and a selective to the people and a sould and

However, the words still sounded, still rang out in Pierre's mind However, the words still sounded, still rang out in Pierre's mind with 'the growing clamour of pealing bells. A new religion; a new religion, new religion. Doubtless it must be a religion nearer to life, giving a larger place to the things of the world, and taking the acquired tuths into due account. And, above all, it must be a religion which was not an appetite for death—Bernadette living solely in order that she might die, Doctor Chassaigne aspiring to the tomb as to the only happiness—for all that spiritualistic abandonment belotom of it was hatred of life, disgust with and cessation of an embellishment of the spheres beyond, an enchanted garden to be entered to it the amorrow of death. Could a new religion ever place that garden of eternal happiness on earth? Where was the place that garden of eternal happiness on earth? Where was the place that garden of eternal happiness on earth? Where was the place that garden of eternal happiness on earth? Where was the place that garden of eternal happiness on earth? Where was the place that garden of eternal happiness on earth? Where was the normula, the dogma, that would satisfy the hopers of the mandrind of to-day? What, belief should give birth to a new faith's and a liarvest of strength and peace? How could one fecundate the matter sort of illusion, what divine falsehood of any kind could be made to germinate in the contemporary world, ravaged as it has made to germinate in the contemporary world, ravaged as it has been upon all sides, broken up by a century of science?

At that moment, without any apparent transition, Pietre saw the face or his brother Cuillaume arise in the troublous depths of his mind. Still, he was not surprised, some secret link must have brought that vision there. All how fond they had been of one another long ago, and what a good brother that elder brother, so upright and gentle, had been! Henceforth, alas, the rupture was upright and gentle, had been! Henceforth, alas, the rupture was complete; Pietre no longer saw Guillaume, since the latter had cloistered himself in his chemical studies, living like a savage in a little suburban house, with a mistress and two big dogs. Then a little suburban house, with a mistress and two big dogs. Then

'ierre's reverie again diverged, and he thought of that trial in thich Guillaume had been mentioned, like one suspected of having ompromising friendships amongst the most violent revolutionaries. t was related, too, that the young man had, after long researches, iscovered the formula of a terrible explosive, one pound of which yould suffice to blow up a cathedral. And Pierre then thought f those Anarchists who wished to renew and save the world by estroying it. They were but dreamers, horrible dreamers; yet freamers in the same way as those innocent pilgrims whom he had een kneeling at the Grotto in an enraptured flock. If the Anarhists, if the extreme Socialists, demanded with violence the quality of wealth, the sharing of all the enjoyments of the world. he pilgrims on their side demanded with tears equality of ealth and an equitable sharing of moral and physical peace. The atter relied on miraeles, the former appealed to brute force. At ottom, however, it was but the same exasperated dream of raternity and justice, the eternal desire for happiness—neither 100r nor sick left, but bliss for one and all. And in fact, had not he primitive Christians been terrible revolutionaries for the pagan vorld, which they threatened, and did, indeed, destroy? They vho were persecuted, whom the others sought to exterminate, are o-day inoffensive, because they have become the Past. rightful Future is ever the man who dreams of a future society; even as to-day it is the madman so wildly bent on social renovation that he harbours the great black dream of purifying every-hing by the flame of conflagrations. This seemed monstrous to Pierre. Yet, who could tell? Therein, perchance, lay the rejuvenated world of to-morrow.

Astray, full of doubts, he nevertheless, in his horror of violence, nade common cause with old society now reduced to defend itself, mable though he was to say whence would come the new Messiah of Gentleness, in whose hands he would have liked to place poor uling mankind. A new religion, yes, a new religion. But it is not asy to invent one, and he knew not to what conclusion to come between the ancient faith, which was dead, and the young faith of to-morrow, as yet unborn. For his part, in his desolation, he was only sure of keeping his vow, like an unbelieving priest watching over the belief of others, chastely and honestly discharging his duties, with the proud sadness that he had been mable to renounce his reason as he had renounced his flesh. And or the rest, he would wait.

However, the train rolled on between large parks, and the engine gave a prolonged whistle, a joyful flourish, which drew lierre from his reflections. The others were stirring, displaying amotion around him. The train had just left Juvisy, and Paris at last near at hand, within a short half-hour's journey. One all were getting their things together: the Sabathiers were ting their little parcels, Elise Rouquet was giving a last glance at lier mirror. For a monnent Madame de Jonquière again hecame anxious concerning La Grivotte, and decided that as the girl was in such a pitiful condition she would have her taken straight to a hospital on arriving; whilst Marie endeavoured to rouse Madame Vincent from the torpor in which she seemed determined to remain. M. de Guersaint, who had been indulging in a little siesta, also had to be awakened. And at last, when sister Hyacinthe had clapped her hands, the whole carriage infonated the "Te Deum," the hymn of praise and thanksgiving. "Te Deum laudamus, te Dominum confitemur. The voices rose dinates to God for the beautiful journey, the marvellous favours that He had already bestowed on them, and would bestow on them yet again,

According the fortifications. The two o'clock sun was slowly descending the vast, pure heavens, so serenely warm. Distant smoke, a ruddy smoke, was rising in light clouds above the immensity of Paris like the scattered, flying breath of that toiling colossus. It was Paris in her forge, Paris with her passions, her battles, her ever-growling thunder, her ardent life ever engendering the life of to-morrow. And the white train, the woeful train of every misery and every dolour, was returning into it all at full speed, sounding in higher and higher strains the piercing flourishes of its whistle-calls. The five hundred pilgrims, the three hundred pistents, were about to disappear in the vast city, fall again upon its whistle-calls. The five hundred pilgrims, the three hundred the hard pavement of life after the prodigious dream in which the hard pavement of life after the prodigious dream in which meed of the consolation of a fresh dream would impel them to start once more on the everlasting pilgrimage to mystery and start once more on the everlasting pilgrimage to mystery and start once more on the everlasting pilgrimage to mystery and torgetfulness.

Ahl unhappy mankind, poor ailing humanity, hungering for illusion, and in the weariness of this waning century distracted and illusion, and in the weariness of this waning century distracted and sore from having too greedily acquired science; it fancies itself ubandoned by the physicians of both the mind and the body, and, in great danger of succumbing to incurable disease, retraces its steps and asks the miracle of its cure of the mystical Lourdes of a past for ever dead! Yonder, however, Bernadette, the new Past for ever dead! Yonder, however, Bernadette, the new is past for ever dead! Yonder, however, Bernadette, the new victim conflering, so touching in her human reality, constitutes the terrible lesson, the sacrifice cut off from the world, the victim condemned to abandonnient, solitude, and death, smitten victim condemned to abandonnient, solitude, and death, smitten with the penalty of being neither woman, nor wife, nor mother, because she heheld the Blessed Virgin.

THE DELANNOY "MIRACLE

(see page 59)

THE principal facts of this strange case were as follows:-From 1877 to 1881 Pierre Delannoy had been employed as ward attendant at different Paris hospitals, where, weary of keeping himself by work, the life of a bed-ridden inmate appeared to him to be an ideal existence. Observation further guided him towards the choice of locomotor ataxy as an ideal complaint, and having obtained admission to the Salpétrière Hospital he there attracted the notice of Professor Charcot, who was at the time making ataxy his special study. For Delannoy, M. Charcot prescribed iodine of potassium and the application of electricity; and after several months of this treatment the patient declared that he felt much better and could safely go at large. In January 1884, however, he entered the Hôtel-Dieu, and was treated for locomotor ataxy by Dr. Gallard; and in 1885 he figured among the inpatients of the Neeker Hospital. The treatment there adopted by Dr. Rigalstrong cauterisations along both sides of the spine—impelled him to seek a more comfortable shelter, in 1886 he removed to the Laënnec Hospital, where Dr. Ball combined morphia injections with belladonna taken internally. In 1887 Delannoy reappeared at the Necker, but, finding himself again placed under Dr. Rigal, he transferred himself as quickly as possible to the Hotel-Dicu, under Dr. Empis. From Charité, where Professor Laboulbène treated him with antipyrine; from Laënnee, whither he returned and where Dr. Ball now diagnosed tabes ataxique, and from the Beaujon Hospital, where he was thought to be suffering from tabes dorsalis, Delamoy eventually passed to the Cochin Hospital, where Dr. Dujardin-Beaumetz subjected him to "suspension" treatment—that is, hanging by a collar with the object of producing an elongation of the morbid spine. Later on, during a second sojourn at the same institution, Dr. Mesnet adopted a milder system, having diagnosed Delannoy's complaint as "selerosis of the posterior cords of the marrow." However, his fifty-two hangings by Dr. Dujardin-Beaumetz, ensuing upon the spinal eauterisations of Dr. Rigal, had materially affected the patient's conception of the ideal: especially as one medical man had recommended his consignment to the Bieetre Asylum as an incurable. Delannoy therefore resolved on a change of life, and deserted Science for Religion.

mongst the maimed and sick who came on pilgrimage to des on August 19, 1889, was a man, grievously crippled, who